The leading candidates to fill the open spot in the backcourt will be newcomers Trish McDonough, Lisa Baglio, and Michele Thornton and junior Annette Delaney. The 5-foot-8-inch McDonough is a sophomore transfer from Loyola Marymount University whose quickness and passing skills make her an early favorite to replace Litkenhaus. The 5-foot-8-inch Delaney received minimal playing time last season but gives the Cats an energetic player. In addition, Perretta will be looking to three freshmen to contribute immediately. Thornton, a preseason pick to the Big East All-Rookie team, gives the Cats a highly-touted recruit with polished offensive skills. The 5-foot-7-inch freshman is the daughter of 'Nova assistant Tom Thornton. Baglio, a 5-foot-7-inch Staten Island product, provides excellent speed, defense and added depth to the backcourt. The third rookie backcourt player is walk-on Nicole Sabol.

The main problem that we will have this season will be we are a very young and inexperienced team.
Head Coach Harry Perretta

Up front, the Cats return numerous key players including starting forwards Benedix and Chaverini. Perretta will also rely on veteranns Eloise Berry, Rosemany Magarity, Mary Beth Tukis and Karen Connell. Benedix, a 5-foot-9-inch swing player, averaged 12.1 points and 6.1 rebounds last season and looks to garner post-season honors. Chaverini, another guard-forward, is a senior who contributed 9.4 ppg. and 85 assists during th 1990-91 campaign. Power forward Magarity gives 'Nova a diverse player. The 6-foot-2-inch senior led the team with 27 blocks and in three-point shooting accuracy (36 percent).

The rest of the frontcourt performers must contribute in order for the Cats to maximize their talent. Junior Karen Connell (6.0 ppg., 3.4 rpg.) will be looking to crack the starting lineup. Seniors Berry (6-1) and Tukis (4.5 ppg., 3.1 rpg.) provide additional depth to the frontcourt.

Perretta has freshmen Jen Snell and Jennifer Maga to use up front as well. Maga, a preseason Big East All-Rookie selection, will challenge Connell for the starting center position. Six-footer Snell is a local product from Archbishop Ryan High School in Philadelphia who possesses good all-around rebounding skills.

Despite the apparent depth, the Cats still have not determined who will run the offense at the point position. Also, the influx of freshmen gives 'Nova a young, albeit talented team.

"The main problem that we will, have this season will be that we are a very young and inexperienced team," said Perretta. "If the new kids can come in and get some experience quickly, then hopefully we can get better as the season goes on."

With the five incoming freshmen, the returning starters and a solid core of veteran role players, the Cats will be searching to mesh their talent. If 'Nova can accomplish this, the 1991-92 season should be a successful one for Perretta and his Cats.

Women to NCAA's

In a meet displaying both the team's depth and talent, the women's cross country squad breezed to its third consecutive East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC) title last weekend and an NCAA Championship berth at Rolling Hills course at Lehigh University. Sonia O'Sullivan led a dominating performance by the Cats as all seven runners ran to personal bests on the 3.1 mile course and improved their winning streak to 20 meets. The win allowed 'Nova a chance to compete at the national championships in Tucson Nov. 25 and the opportunity to capture its third straight title. No university in NCAA history has had three national title teams, much less three straight.

"I don't believe in averages," Head Coach Marty Stern said in reference to the Cats' chance to repeat. "If we stay focused and maintain the level we achieved this weekend, I think we can win. The teams that most concern us are Arkansas and Providence, but we just have to run our race."

Maintaining focus and running her race is exactly what O'Sullivan did at the ECAC's as she stormed the course and ran a personal best 16:00. The fifth-year senior and member of the Irish Olympic team is undefeated this year and the favorite to repeat as national champion.

"Sonia has just been tremendous," Stern said. "The toughest thing to do is win when you're supposed to and Sonia and our entire team have done that. She just keeps winning and winning."

But true to the Cats' form the entire year, O'Sullivan was not alone in the quest to repeat as national champs. Aided by the srong running of Nnenna Lynch, Carole Zajac, Cheri Goddard, and

The volleyball team went 2-1 in the Asics Autumn Classic held at the Nevin Field House last weekend to run its overall record to 30-5.

Setter Vicky Dispenza and outside hitter Jennifer Neville garnered First Team All-Tournament honors. Dispenza was also named the tournament MVP.

Coach David Barkley was disappointed with the Cats' level of play. "We kind of feel like we let ourselves down," said Barkley. "Even though we won two out of the three matches, we just knew we were not playing at the level we wanted to play at. We just were not in focus. We were off our gameplan."

'Nova began the tournament strong, finishing off St. Bonaventure in three straight games (15-8,15-6,15-6). But trouble came in the second round against Providence. The Friars handed 'Nova its first home loss of the season as they swept the Cats (9-15,9-15,5-15). The loss marked the Cats' third in their last four matches.

Barkley described the team confidence as being "a little bruised" after the defeat. But he hoped the match would serve as a wake-up call for the team and inspire it to play better.

This was indeed the case in their next match, as the Cats concluded the tournament by downing Fairleigh Dickinson (16-14,15-9,15-9).

'Nova must now travel to Pittsburgh this weekend to take part in the Big East Tournament. The second-seeded Cats will open against Connecticut, a scrappy team tht gave them trouble at home earlier in the season. Should 'Nova reach the finals, it would probably face the top-seeded Panthers in a rematch of a contest held

Women's cross country wins third national championship

The bigger they are the harder they fall. Or so it was thought.

In dominating fashion, the women's cross country team left its opponents in the dust of the Arizona desert after it cruised to an unprecedented third consecutive national championship and staked its claim to a dynasty in a sports world overflowing with parity.

"Dynasties are unusual in today's sports world," Head Coach Marty Stern said. "With the reduction of scholarships and the ability of one key recruit to change the face of a whole program, it's very difficult to remain on top. But it's a credit to our kids that they keep winning."

In a setting dominated by 75-degree weather and high altitude, the Cats battled through individual problems and won the team competition easily, outdistancing its nearest rival, Arkansas, 85-168 at the 3.1 mile El Conquistador Country Club in Tucson. No team had won three national championships coming into the meet.

While 'Nova broke the team record for championships, it also set the record for consecutive national individual champions as Sonia O'Sullivan made a late burst over the final 150 yards to overcome fellow Cat Carole Zajac and become the third straight winner in her final race as a Cat. O'Sullivan, who will run the 3000 meters at the 1992 Olympics for Ireland, successfully defended her 1990 title in 16:30 to become the first woman ever to win back-to-back championships. Former

Middle States' tactic questioned

By JENNIFER CASTELLI
News Editor

The U.S. Department of Education's staff accused the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools accrediting agency of forcing some colleges to diversify in exchange for reaccreditation, according to an article titled "Report hits firm that rates schools," in the Nov. 21 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer. Middle States Association accredits all academic programs at the University.

There has never been an incident at Villanova in which Middle States has coerced the University to diversify, said Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs. The accrediting agency visits the University every 10 years with five-year reexaminations, he said.

The report requests that the Department of Education permit Middle States an "unusual one-year re-authorization instead of the standard five," according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The report also suggests that the firm has been discriminating against males and whites in an attempt to get more minorities and women hired for campus positions, according to the Inquirer.

The article also reported that Middle States enforced these practices even when they contradicted a school's mission statement, according to the Department of Education report.

Diversity can make an educational experience more interesting, but it is not necessary, said Kristin Haaf, co-chairwoman for the College Republican's Committee for a Liberal Education. "I don't necessarily think that a diverse student body will determine the quality of education," said Haaf.

Cheerleaders' cash cut for long hair

By MATT BRENNAN
Senior Reporter

A dispute has erupted between the Villanova University cheerleading team and the Villanova men's basketball Head Coach Rollie Massimino concerning the hair length of a male cheerleader. Massimino said the situation has stopped him from providing future "gifts" as he had for the cheerleaders in the past.

"In the past if I had extra sneakers and sweat suits available, I would provide the cheerleaders with them," said Massimino. "Yes, the situation has stopped me from providing things. Absolutely, it is absolutely my right as long as I'm in the frame-work of my philosophy."

According to Kenneth Sachar, cheerleader and senior management major from Phillipsburg, N.J., in a meeting Nov. 6 Massimino requested that he cut his hair because he considered the cheerleading team a part of his basketball program and its appearance a reflection on that program. Sachar, who wears his hair in a pony-tail style, refused to cut it.

"We approached the cheerleading coaches to see if there was something that could be done about it, and they agreed his hair was long. So, I met with him and he wasn't very nice. I said fine, do what you want," said Massimino.

"Coach Massimino told me that I don't look like a Villanova student. Well, what does a Villanova student look like? Is it a person with hair combed to the side and who drives a jeep? This is definitely stereotypical," said Sachar. "I tried to prove a point by telling him he didn't look like a basketball coach and this offended him."

Massimino also refused to accept a list of four concessions that the cheerleading team presented as appeasement. The concessions included hiding Sachar's hair under his shirt, wearing team hats, scheduling so that Sachar did not participate in televised games and/or allowing Sachar to participate as the Wildcat Mascot.

"I have certain standards upheld by my basketball team," said Massimino. "We made our decision."

Cheerleading moderator Suzanne Shea said the amount of money the team saved in the past from the sneakers and sweat suits varied but that the team was planning to spend approximately $375-400 on sneakers and approximately $640 on sweat suits for this year's 15-member squad.

"The total budget for cheerleading is a little over $27,000 this year and the moderators supervise the budget, but the cheerleading budget is separate from basketball," said Richard Sieber, budget officer for Villanova.

Joe Mulligan, business manager of the athletic department, agreed that Massimino had no control over the team's budget.

Logo commemorates next year's 150th anniversary

By LARISA EPATKO

The University commissioned the design of a logo to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the University next year. The logo will be visible on campus from Sept. 18, 1992 to Sept. 19, 1993, according to the fall issue of the Villanova magazine.

The symbol features the spires of St. Thomas of Villanova Church in royal blue and gold. The church marks the center of the inner campus and "symbolizes the continuing quest for knowledge at the heart of the University's tradition," according to the Villanova magazine.

Agnew and Corrigan Advertising, based in Lancaster, designed the graphic with the input of the Sesquicentennial Steering Committee, the President's Office, the Office of University Development and the Graphic Services Office, said Christine A. Lysionek, managing director of the sesquicentennial.

"The sesquicentennial logo was designed with the entire Villanova community in mind and depicts a symbol that figures prominently in most people's impressions about the unique and special nature of the University," Lysionek said.

The new logo will appear on banners, publications, signs, athletic arm patches and T-shirts, said Lysionek.

Stationery featuring the anniversary logo will be available to faculty and staff correspondence by Jan. 13, the beginning of the spring semester, said Lysionek.

At the conclusion of the founding celebration, the logo's use will continue without reference to the "150th anniversary," according to Villanova magazine.

The Sesquicentennial Steering Committee, comosed of 17 alumni, faculty, staff and administrators, will guide the next year's anniversary activities. The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, appointed the committee members.

The celebration includes academic symposia, athletic, cultural and social events, historical projects, awards and opening and closing ceremonies, according to the summer issue of the Villanova magazine.

The theme of the sesquicentennial is "Truth, Unity, Love," based on the Latin words "Veritas, Unitas, Caritas," that appear on the official University seal. Student Life Vice President Richard Neville, head of the committee, chose the theme.

Joseph James Cicippio of Norristown, Penn. was freed Dec. 2 after being held hostage for five years and two months in Beirut by a Shiite Muslim group. The release followed what the captors, the Revolutionary Justice Organization, felt were "positive results" from the United Nations, Syria, Lebanon and Iran negotiations. The Israeli-backed militia in Southern Lebanon freed 25 Arabs held in Khiam Prison there.

Cicippio, 61, who was formerly comptroller for the American University of Beirut, is reuniting with friends and family members and undergoing extensive medical examination. He is the fourth hostage released since August.

In addition, the United States paid Iran $260 million to compensate for a submarine, helicopters, and other weapons seized during the 1979-1980 Tehran hostage crisis. The payment coincides with the release of Cicippio, but both United States and Iranian officials deny any link between the financial arbitrations and the hostages in Lebanon.

KIEV, U.S.S.R.

Despite warnings from Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev that it would be a "catastrophe" for the republic and what remains of the Soviet Union, the Ukraine declared independence Dec. 2 after 90.5 percent of the voters supported the referendum to sever ties with the Union in the Dec. 1 election. An estimated 80 percent of the republic's 37 million voters turned out to express their desire for freedom.

This vote means that a large, new state the size of France with a population of 52 million people will emerge in Europe.

This move for independence may mark the end of the Soviet empire, for the Ukraine accounted for a quarter of the economic might of the former U.S.S.R., and both Gorbachev and Russian President Boris N. Yeltsin have said that they cannot conceive of a union without the Ukraine.

The Soviet president announced that should he fail to create a new union of former Soviet republics, he will step down from his six-year reign over the U.S.S.R. Because voters chose secession-minded Parliament Chairman Leonid Kravchuk for president, Gorbachev's future efforts may be futile.

Russia and Poland announced Dec. 2 that the independence and new nation of Ukraine would immediately be recognized, while Canada said it would enter negotiations on establishing diplomatic relations. The White House hailed the Ukraine's vote as a positive development, but did not extend diplomatic recognition.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) announced Dec. 2 that it would make a controversial experimental anti-Alzheimer's drug widely accessible to patients while it is still under study.

The drug, Tacrine, would be the first made available to treat the progressive degenerative disease which ranks as the fourth leading cause of death of American adults. Alzheimer's afflicts four million Americans and kills 100,000 annually, striking more than 10 percent of those over age 65 and 50 percent of those 85 or older.

The drug is not a cure for the fatal disease which causes a gradual deterioration of mental processes, like memory, but it does reduce the effects. It has helped some Alzheimer's victims to improve their ability to think and function, according to its manufacturer, Warner Lambert Co. of Morris Plains, N.J.

The agency acted on the advice of the FDA advisory committee that Tacrine be offered to patients only if carefully controlled clinical trials continued at the same time.

Suspects arrested

By LARISA EPATKO

The Atlantic City Police Department contacted the University Department of Public Safety Dec. 2 about the arrest of two suspects linked to several thefts from automobiles in South Jersey, the Philadelphia area and surrounding suburbs, said Tracey Hentz, Public Safety investigator. Warrants are out for the arrest of two more alleged accomplices, Hentz said.

"Stolen items have been recovered. Some items are believed to have been stolen from vehicles parked at Villanova," according to a Public Safety crime alert.

Cameras at an Atlantic City casino parking lot recorded the suspects breaking into some of the vehicles. Atlantic City police were able to identify one white male and arrest him, said Public Safety Investigator David Mann.

The first suspect implicated three other accomplices involved in thefts from autos at St. Joseph's and Villanova universities and other suburban campuses since August, said Mann.

All four suspects were students at various colleges, Mann said, adding that the first suspect was a student at Pennsylvania State University, where nine thefts from autos had occurred.

The Atlantic City Police Department gave the University information on the incident. Public Safety compared the information to their records of thefts from autos at the University, Mann said.

The stolen property included stolen speakers, stereo equipment and compact discs, which the suspects would sell to students on college campuses, said Mann. Students at Penn State University alerted the administration that

Political Science Press Release

Seven University students traveled to Washington, D.C., Nov. 11-15 to work with delegations from 37 other universities from across the country in the Model Organization of American States (OAS) at the OAS headquarters across from the Washington Monument.

Each delegation represented a member nation of the OAS in debates about such issues as how to respond to the recent military coup in Haiti, cross-border environmental problems, the illegal drug trade, economic development and next year's quincentennial observance of Columbus' voyage to the Americas.

The OAS is the world's oldest regional international organization, comprised of almost all the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

Meredith Hodder, the team leader, led Villanova's delegation at the Plenary session in the Hall of the Americas Nov. 11 when the model was addressed by Joao Clemente Baena Soares, the secretary general of the OAS. Soares discussed how the actual OAS develops regional cooperation.

Pat Kalellis, a senior from Greece, spoke Nov. 11 to 400 student delegates about the positions held by the government of St. Vincent and the Grenadines, a Caribbean island nation near Grenada.

The team met Nov. 12 with a spokesperson for the St. Vincent government about how the students could best represent it during the week's model.

Jan Stehle, a freshman from Germany, and Kalellis began caucasing with other delegations of the first committee for support of their resolution, which specified how the Inter-American Juridical Committee could develop children's rights in the hemisphere.

Senior David Wright, a veteran of last year's Model Arab League, worked to convince his second committee that governments should limit the regional arms trade.

Colleges gather to exchange ideas

By SONNY THOMPSON

Mark O'Rourke, Student Government president organized a roundtable discussion at the St. David and Radnor rooms of Connelly Center Nov. 23. The purpose of the meeting was to provide the opportunity to establish a collegiate network, said O'Rourke.

"This newly established association should serve to foster a better understanding and appreciation between the respective student governments of these institutions," said O'Rourke in his letter to the participants.

Students from Cabrini College, Eastern College, St. Joseph's University, the Community College of Philadelphia, Rosemont College, La Salle University and Villanova University attended the discussion. Representatives from Drexel University, the University of Pennsylvania, Temple University and the Philadelphia College of Textiles and Sciences did not attend the discussion. There was a total of 33 participants.

Opening remarks were given by the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., Rev. Patrick Rice, O.S.A., vice president of Administration; Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president of Student Life; Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities; Kathleen J. Byrnes, assistant to the Dean of Students, and Gary H. Bonas, associate director of Student Activities. Each faculty member had an individual message, but all stressed the importance of Student Government and encouraged the increase of communication between the Student Government Association (S.G.A.) and the administration, O'Rourke said.

"Working together with the administration increases and improves the quality of life of eachof our universities," said Neville.

Communication, relations with administration, budget and the election process were themes of the discussion. The majority of participants were concerned about reaching out to the students. Representatives of the universities said there is a universal student apathy throughout the surrounding campuses.

The discussion offered ideas to improve student involvement and increase student awareness. The participants agreed that increased communication between students and the government helped the S.G.A. operate more efficiently.

Dealing with administration and cutting through bureaucracy were topics discussed. Student presidents said they were frustrated by the amount of red tape and realized the importance of having a cooperative faculty.

"The more control you have over your money, the more power you have," said a representative from Cabrini College.

The government felt hindered by the lack of control over its funds, said O'Rourke. The Community College of Philadelphia sent representatives to the National S.G.A. Conference in Florida, but Villanova could not, due to budget constraints, he said.

Another problem voiced by University senators was the lack Fraternity blood drive a success

The University chapter of Alpha Tau Omega fraternity sponsored a campus wide blood drive Nov. 19-21 in which 407 pints of blood were donated, said Mike Grenon, a member of the fraternity and coordinator of the event. The drive was held in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall, and the donated blood will be used in area hospitals.

The Red Cross set a goal of 500 donors, said Grenon. The actual turnout was 493 people, but only 407 people were accepted to give blood. This was a positive increase from last year's outcome of 316 donors, Grenon said.

"This year's drive was very successful. We had 91 people more than last year and we were very busy all three days," said Grenon.

The drive is usually held in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center, but the fraternity was unable to reserve the room this year.

"There may have been an even greater turnout if we had been able to get the Villanova Room. The lines in Dougherty were out the door," said Grenon.

"The drive was open to both University students and the public.

Multiculturalism discussed in University curriculum

By MATTHEW J. BRENNAN
Senior Reporter

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., spoke on diversity and the University in an exclusive interview with the Villanovan Nov. 25.

What does diversity mean to you as president of Villanova?

"Villanova is strongly committed, as most good universities are, to a strong diversity in its student body, faculty and staff ... The strategic plan, although it hasn't been approved yet, has a strong statement that it will be a community of diversity, race, gender, geography, culture ... that is a general University commitment. But at the same time we are committed to a stronger consideration of multiple cultures in our curriculum ... The College of Arts and Sciences is working on a new core culliculum, and within that core curriculum is a call for a multicultural component and an international component ... "

"This is not something entirely new; our society has become aware of the multiplicity of cultures because our world is more international, more global. Also, within our own country we are aware of the diversity of people from different cultures.

"In order to prepare people, as any university must, to live in our society, not only now but in the future, we must have a greater sensitivity to these differences ... If you were to study Christian theology, take the New Testament, you will find the New Testament has multiple cultural backgrounds. Each of those letters or gospels comes from a different area ...

"Villanova, just to be a good university, is committed to having its students understand, in some degree of depth, those different cultures.

"You get to know your own cultural background better as a result of studying other cultures."

How did you feel about the recent advertisement in the Villanovan and the anonymous letter distributed at Homecoming that accused the proposed core curriculum of potentially advocating gay rights and abortion rights?

"I think this is an ignorance of what the multicultural component and the core curriculum were established for. I mean there is absolutely no way in which that core curriculum was providing advocacy for either gay rights or abortion rights.

> I mean there is absolutely no way in which that core curriculum was providing advocacy for either gay rights or abortion rights.
> Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin,
> University president

"One of the problems with multiculturalism is that it has become laden with stereotypical connotations that have to do with splintering the curriculum and allowing various political groups to advocate their somewhat radical political programs through the curriculum.

"This is not the point of the initiative at Villanova either through this core curriculum or the initiatives that we will be taking to emphasize more understanding of difference within the [general] curriculum.

"I love the debate, it is good to have the debate. I was very nervous when I first saw [the anonymous letter]. First, it was not signed. That type of thing is never healthy, when you have 'Concerned Students of Villanova' ... That is demagoguery, when you try and take advantage ... For instance, they tried to get alumni to write letters, I received just three [letters] but they only said they hoped this was not going on.

"I don't want to be in the position of condemning what they did. I don't like that approach to things, but to have them express their opinion and then to have the community come back and discuss the issues involved is great ... it helps us accomplish the educational component that is implied in the whole multicultural issue."

Correction

An article in the Nov. 22 edition of the Villanovan titled "Multiculturalism questioned" incorrectly quoted Kristin Haaf, cochairwoman for the College Republican's Committee for a Liberal Education, as saying that there was a pro-choice agenda being taught in her Women's Studies class. Actually, Haaf said that there was a political agenda being taught in the class.

Also, Haaf's name was incorrectly spelled.

The Villanovan regrets these errors.

The squad cheers for the football team, the men's basketball team and the women's basketball team at home and certain away games.

Sieber said the team spent approximately $25,500 last year and the majority of the money is spent on travel, hotel and meal expenses for away games.

The team decided together that they would support Sachar's right to wear his hair the way he pleased, according to John Varanelli, co-captain of cheerleading.

The Villanova University Cheerleading Team includes men and women volunteers and falls under the women's athletic department, according to the Villanova University Cheerleading Handbook.

The Villanova University Cheerleading Handbook requires all members to dress in appropriate manner as representatives of Villanova University. For air travel, a more business-like attire must be worn. The handbook does not restrict hair length.

"We require the cheerleaders to be well groomed," said Shea. "We consider Ken to be well groomed."

According to Dean Alvin Clay, of Commerce and Finance, intercollegiate athletics requires extra attention to appearance. Clay is a member of the Villanova University Senate Budget Committee.

"Rollie probably feels that Ken should sacrifice for the team, Ken probably thinks Rollie is being arrogant. They are never going to agree," said Daniel Regan, the University faculty athletic representative. "Rollie has the right to demand certain standards of his team. He is dealing with 15 superegos on the basketball team so he needs discipline and he feels it should extend to cheerleading."

The discussion group said that incentives should be offered. At Eastern College, the president receives payment for services provided to the school. Other ideas included giving academic credit for activities to offering post-graduate opportunities.

The group discussed ways to increase the amount of student voters. They said that abundant advertising and events, like giving candy or ice cream to voters, was the best way to increase awareness.

O'Rourke said the most valuable achievement was being able to compare and understand how other student governments handle their environments.

Lecture on hunger raises student awareness

By BECKY UMLAND
Staff Reporter

Marc Cohen, a research developer of Bread for the World Institute of Hunger and Development, spoke on world hunger Nov. 21 as part of Hunger Awareness Week. The lecture was sponsored by the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Bread for the World was established 17 years ago in Washington, D.C., at the "height of world food crisis which affected Africa and Asia," said Cohen. Bread for the World involves people lobbying to seek justice for the hungry and research to support them, he said.

Bread for the World recently published its second annual report on world hunger, titled "Hunger 1992: Ideas That Work," said Cohen. In the report, ideas are provided for people to help cease world hunger.

The Institute alternates its focus yearly from domestic to international hunger, said Cohen. Currently it is focusing on the horn of Africa, he said.

Other areas suffering from widespread hunger are Bangledesh, Peru and Eastern Europe, Cohen said. Wars, political turmoil and drought are factors which increase hunger in many of these nations, he added.

One out of five people cannot eat adequate calories for an active, healthy existence, said Cohen. Five-and-a-half million children are hungry, while 12 million poor people are at risk of being hungry, he said.

Bread for the World created the WIC Program (Women, Infants and Children). For every dollar spent on WIC, $3-$4 are saved in Medicaid.

Bread for the World is also trying a child-survival program. About 40,000 children die a day from preventable causes. One out of five children are so badly nourished that they become permanently physically and mentally impaired, he said.

The ideas that work include the expansion of food banks, pantries and soup kitchens, training people to be self-sufficient, and increasing the production of food through a "green revolution," said Cohen.

Presently, $300 billion are spent by the government on the military, and only $25 billion are spent on Federal Food Programs, he said.

"Hunger 1992: Ideas That Work" says that it is the "global failure of moral vision, political will and collective action" that is preventing people from putting these ideas into action.

Cohen recommends that college students get involved with the University's chapter of Bread for the World to find out what is happening in Washington, D.C. Students can also volunteer at local soup kitchens, said Cohen.

The Center for Peace and Justice has Bread for the World newsletters and a hotline number providing updates on legislative issues, he said. There is also a course offered on world hunger that can be taken for credit, he added.

Prospective resident assistants application process begins for '91-'92

By ELIZABETH BARSZCZEWSKI
Assistant News Editor

The two-phase process by which resident assistants (RA) for the 1991-92 academic year will be chosen has already begun, said Marie Schauder, assistant director for Training and Development for Residence Life.

The first phase consists of a round of interviewing, once the candidates have filled out their application, said Schauder. The second phase consists of another round of interviews before the final selection is made over Spring Break, she said.

The first step in becoming an RA is attending an information meeting, at which time an application may be picked up, said Schauder. Once the application has been submitted, the candidate must undergo a round of interviews, she said.

The interview can take two forms. A candidate can choose to meet with three student staff members or as a group, said Schauder. In this case, the applicant meets with a group of six to eight other RA candidates and goes through a series of exercises and questions which will provide them with an idea of what they may experience as an RA, Schauder said.

The individual candidates are evaluated by three staff members, she said. The group process of interviewing usually takes place on a Saturday for approximately three hours, she added.

Of an applicant pool of 200, only 100 to 125 will be selected to go to phase two of the application process, Schauder said. A candidate who successfully completes round one of the application process then faces another round of interviewing, she said.

This time, the applicant meets with three professional staff members from the Office of Residence Life and one student staff member, Schauder said. At this time any recommendations the candidate may have will be reviewed, she said.

In past years it was a mandatory part of the RA selection process that an applicant have three recommendations. These included one from the applicant's RA if the applicant lived on campus and two additional recommendations from someone on campus, Schauder added.

This year the recommendations are an optional part of the RA selection process. A recommendation from the applicant's RA is preferred, and any additional recommendations are welcomed by those selecting next year's RAs. If a candidate does not have one, it will not be counted against them, said Schauder.

The staff of the Residence Life Office will meet over Spring Break to select the candidates who will fill the approximately 50 available RA positions on campus, Schauder said.

Speaker explains Xerox marketing techniques

The International Business Society sponsored a lecture by Sharon M. Zalis Nov. 20 at 4:30 p.m. in Bartley Hall.

The society's President Elena Leon and Secretary Ramez Helou introduced Zalis, a 1983 Villanova graduate, who is currently a major account sales manager for the Xerox Corporation.

Zalis discussed Xerox's approach to marketing in a changing global environment. In such an environment, with the world "rapidly networking," Zalis stressed the "critical need to have a very strong marketing plan."

> Quality is the buzzword of the nineties in corporate America.
> Sharon M. Zalis, a major account sales manager

The corporation has adapted itself in recent years to become stronger globally, said Zalis. The corporation today employs 110,000 people worldwide and markets supplies in over 130 countries, she said.

Zalis also stressed the importance of quality in today's market place.

"Quality is the buzzword of the nineties in corporate America, Zalis said. "Quality is an international language," he added.

In addition to quality guarantees, Xerox has also attempted to heighten customer satisfaction through improved customer service, said Zalis.

To insure that they are succeeding as a corporation, Xerox has actively taken part in benchmarking, she said. Zalis added that this is "the process of measuring our products, services and practices against our toughest competitors or those companies recognized as world leaders." These policies are strengthening Xerox, she said.

"With the dynamic changes currently taking place, with everyone trying to be successful in marketing, it is an exciting time to be employed in the industry," said Zalis.

Dr. Edmund Ghareeb delivered a lecture on the portrayal of Arabs in the American media.

Arab role in media discussed

By CHRISTA MRUZ
Staff Reporter

The Center for Arab and Islamic Studies sponsored a lecture by Dr. Edmund Ghareeb titled "The Portrayal of Arabs in the Western Media" Nov. 20 in Tolentine Hall.

Americans fail to understand the Arabs' motivations and dealings with the West, said Ghareeb. This misunderstanding surfaces due in part to the Arabs themselves because they neglect to be open with the West, he said.

The media portrays Arabs negatively, he added.

"The media makes Arabs out to look like nomadic figures who wear headdresses and are oversexed," said Ghareeb.

Arabs are viewed as bad, yet the Israelis are seen as wonderful allies to the United States, he said.

"For years, Arabs have been used as scapegoats for the West's interference," said Ghareeb.

"All of these ideas generate through the fact that coverage of news hits the United States only when something big occurs," he said. The media also fails to give background information behind shocking incidents, said Ghareeb.

"All the misinterpretation explodes into conflict, such as the Gulf War," he said.

Students utilize services for career advancement

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

Students are encouraged to come to the Career Planning and Placement Center located in the basement of Corr Hall during business hours to seek advisement and consultations, said director Nancy Dudak. The center's services are free of charge and voluntary.

Career counseling is the main service the center provides. Counselors help students decide which careers are compatible with their academic preparation, skills, interests and values, according to the 1991-1992 Placement Manual.

On-campus recruiting is another service sponsored by the center.

"About 300 companies visit Villanova to interview graduating seniors," said Dudak. The center also provides job listings from employers who do not recruit on campus but are interested in hiring a Villanova graduate, according to the Placement Manual.

Directories and publications containing information about jobs, careers, employers, graduate programs and salary and employment trends are located in the Career Library in the Career Planning and Placement Center. This literature is available for all University students to use, said Dudak.

The center provides a resume referral service and a resume assistance service for University students, Dudak said. Area employers contact the Career Planning and Placement Center with job openings and request that resumes of qualified candidates be sent to them, according to the Placement Manual. Students who submit resumes automatically become part of the resume referral service, said Dudak.

A group of student volunteers assist the office personnel with career planning activities. These peer counselors are specially trained to assist students in resume preparation, organizing a job search, locating information in the Career Library and understanding the office's services, said Dudak.

Interview preparation workshops are sponsored by the center weekly, said Dudak. A counselor explains proper interview etiquette and reviews typical questions asked by employers, according to the Placement Manual.

The center helps students find summer employment and part-time jobs during the academic year, said Dudak. Local employers meet on campus to discuss employment opportunities with University students, she said.

The center sponsored Career Days Oct. 8 and 9. Representatives from over 70 companies came to the University and provided information to students about their organizations, said Dudak.

A new event sponsored by the Career Planning and Placement Center is the "Network Nights," said Dudak. "Network Nights" are informal evening socials held in major East Coast cities Jan. 6-8 for alumni to meet with current University students and discuss career options. These socials are designed so that students who are home on Christmas recess can speak with Villanova alumni who are currently working in career fields which may interest them, said Dudak.

The Career Planning and Placement Center is heavily used by students, said Dudak. Two-thirds of all seniors use the center, she said.

Middle States

World Report used diversity as a criterion to rank colleges regionally in its annual report last September, said Mark O'Rourke, Student Government president. To assume that Villanova is immune from "current trends in academia would be extremely naive," said O'Rourke.

"The Middle State accreditors probably have an established criteria by which to evaluate colleges and universities. I would hope that the accreditors would first focus on academic standards and teaching excellence — issues such as diversity are peripheral when measuring educational quality," O'Rourke said.

These allegations have added to the growing debate over diversity on college campuses around the nation.

"Diversity is definitely an issue that is coming into vogue now," said Bob Langran political science professor. "I think that diversity is certainly one of the things that they [accreditors] can use," he said.

"To be accredited, a school must conform with standards and be outstanding," said Kati Suprenak, vice president of the College Democrats. "If Middle States feels that an outstanding university should include diversity as a standard or essential element of education, then they are well founded in their decision," she said.

Diversity can expose and introduce students "to an understanding of the world which is in itself a necessary and useful part of education," added Suprenuk.

Middle States evaluates more than 500 colleges and universities in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, Delaware, the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico.

Harold L. Simmons, executive director of Middle States, had no comment on the report.

they had been approached by people selling the equipment, he added.

The University notified surrounding colleges and universities about the warrants and suspect arrests to help recover some of the stolen property and assist in the convictions, Mann said.

Vehicles such as jeeps, convertibles and soft tops were the easiest to break into, said Hentz.

Mann said he wanted to inform students at the University of the arrests so that property taken from cars on campus may be recovered. Students who have filed a report will be contacted by Public Safety to identify possible recovered items.

"The kids were using a silver Toyota truck, and one had a [Nissan] 280 Z," Mann said. Two of the suspects are from Brigatine, N.J., and two are from West Philadelphia, he added.

The suspects will face multiple charges in various counties and states due to the extent of the thefts, said Mann.

Jewish Council sponsors Holocaust, racism lecture

By ANTHONY PALLADINO
Staff Reporter

Leon Bass spoke on "Lessons of the Holocaust" Dec. 3 in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall. The presentation was sponsored by the Jewish Community Relations Council of Philadelphia.

Bass is co-chairperson of the Interfaith Council on the Holocaust and witness to the liberation of Buchenwald Concentration Camp. He made the connection between the prejudice he faced as a black man and that which the Jews suffered.

Bass' lecture focused on his experiences in the 183rd Engineering Combat Battalion during World War II.

Bass said that at age 19 he saw many of his dead friends being carried away and realized his efforts were for a country that made him sit in the back of buses and restaurants, drink only from "colored" water fountains and that "wasn't good enough."

Bass said his suffering diminished April 3, 1945, when he saw the prejudice against the Jews, homosexuals and communists inside the Buchenwald Concentration Camp.

Bass traveled to the crematorium where human ashes were scattered like fertilizer, he said. "Human suffering can touch all of us," Bass said, adding that at the crematorium, he decided to help fight against racism.

After graduating from West Chester University in 1949, Bass taught in a segregated grammar school.

Bass took faith in people like Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King Jr., who taught, "We will wear them down with our capacity for love," said Bass.

King's attitude inspired Bass to become the principal of Benjamin Franklin High School, he said. One student at the school said, "If you don't do something now we're gonna burn this place down," according to Bass.

Bass said people should share in the love that "parents, who get up every morning to provide comforts, possess."

People can lead protest without throwing rocks and confront evil without being evil, Bass said.

"Either we love one another . . . or the sea will engulf us, and the light will go out," said Bass, quoting James Baldwin.

150th anniversary

Lysionek's job is to coordinate the steering committee's subcommittees and "take care of the behind-the-scenes logistical work," she said.

Activities planned for the anniversary celebration include an opening ceremony in the stadium during the weekend of Sept. 18 to 20, a night football game Friday night, an outdoor luncheon on Saturday and a cocktail party and dance under tents on Mendel field, said Lysionek. Dobbin will celebrate mass on Sunday, she added.

The weekend that will bring the sesquicentennial year to a close will feature a "huge birthday cake and an international food and cultural festival," according to the Villanova magazine.

Alumni can participate in an expanded weeklong reunion celebration in June 1993, said Robert Capone, Alumni director. "If logistics prevent alumni from returning to campus for the reunion or for any of the other yearlong events, 67 alumni clubs and societies all over the world are planning events to observe the sesquicentennial," Capone said.

The historical projects will include memorabilia that alumni have collected during their college years, said the Rev. Dennis J. Gallagher, O.S.A., the University's archivist. Nothing is too trivial, he added.

The Villanovan's Christmas Wish

What will it be this year: a shiny new car, a complete catalogue wardrobe, or a Spring Break trip to Cancun?

Ho, ho, ho! Christmas is certainly a time to dream. Have you sent your wish list to Santa? With visions of sugarplums dancing in our heads, many of us imagine waking Dec. 25 to a room filled with the gifts that answer our material prayers.

The Villanovan dreams too! The tree in front of Kennedy Hall could use some gifts beneath its sparkling branches. Maybe old St. Nick will stop by with some surprises. (We will send him the following list with the next express mail.)

How about some MONEY, MONEY, MONEY? We could use more than a little for the endowment, academic scholarships and new dormitories. Since Main Lot will be empty, 1,000 armored trucks, each carrying millions of dollars, could park comfortably there.

Of course, PARKING may be difficult when students return. Maybe another 10 levels could be added to our new parking garage. It would certainly be nice to find an open space. Students could even make it to class on time.

Speaking of students, we could use a few more CONCERNED STUDENTS. Not "The Concerned Students of Villanova," of course. More people willing to engage in open and thoughtful debate would fit nicely under the Christmas tree.

However, if they come, we will need more HOUSING.

But, we will need to change the ATTITUDES OF TOWNSHIP AUTHORITIES, too; a CROSSWALK OVER LANCASTER would help.

Also, an NCAA BASKETBALL CHAMPIONSHIP TROPHY, more student SOCIAL LIFE opportunities and DIVERSITY would brighten next semester immensely.

Who says we cannot ask? After all, Christmas is a time for miracles.

AIDS education needed at 'Nova

The "Campaign for Community" program sponsored National AIDS Awareness Day at Villanova Dec. 2 in order to help increase understanding of the deadly disease. Villanova and the entire nation must sponsor more of these programs to alleviate the ignorance and stereotypes surrounding the virus.

When basketball star Earvin "Magic" Johnson announced his retirement from the sport Nov. 7 due to HIV infection, he created a national stir that brought the AIDS issue the prominence it should have had long ago. Unfortunately, it took a visible, respected, heterosexual figure to spark the needed concern.

Why? Because society, or at least a large part of it, is simply prejudiced against "target" groups and unaware of the facts about AIDS transmission.

The ignorance and stereotypes exist at Villanova as well. Within minutes of Johnson's announcement, jokes and accusations concerning his sexual orientation came from the mouths of students, particularly men. Whether this is male machoism or perverted humor, it is clear that even many of the brightest young people suffer from lack of awareness and, as a result, blatant bias against homosexuals.

Clearly the fear of reality overrules the need for compassion and understanding for AIDS patients, whether heterosexual or homosexual. Does it matter if Johnson was gay? If he was, does that make him less of a person and open for ridicule? Obviously, many students thought so. Hopefully, programs like the one initiated by the "Campaign for Community" will eliminate such prejudice.

LETTERS

To the Editor:

This letter is to express my disgust at the College Republicans approach to the multiculturalism debate, specifically the proposed curriculum requirement. As many know, the proposed multicultural requirement constitutes only two classes; one in international studies (non North American, Western Europe) and one in American ethnic minorities or women's studies. It was the College Republicans who made the illogical interpretation of this proposal being a cover for homosexuality and abortion. Acting on people's fears, it was the College Republicans who issued those anonymous letters during Homecoming weekend that denounced multiculturalism as a front for homosexuality and abortion. It was also the College Republicans who used bigoted slogans to advertise for an "open forum" on the proposed curriculum.

Their "open forum," however, was a lie. The College Republicans admitted they never intended to hold an open forum and instead used this ad to attract an audience for their speaker. Needless to say, both the speaker and the audience were deceived. Such an act was not only rude to all who were mislead but this show of immaturity embarrassed Joseph Sobrans, the speaker, who was a guest at Villanova. The College Republicans were manipulative and deceptive in their efforts to convince others of their narrow views.

In my opinion the College Republicans' lies, manipulations and hate-filled actions have damaged this University. By rejecting intellectual discourse and playing on people's fears and emotions, the College Republicans have violated the idea of a liberal education. Banning the College Republicans will only create a martyr for those who view multiculturalism as the devil's work. However, I feel that we should view the College Republicans with a suspicious eye. Their positions on issues such as multiculturalism contain a hidden, hate-filled agenda.

Stephen Smith

To the Editor:

I wish to express my feeling of absolute vexation concerning the recent actions of the College Republicans. I have thoroughly assessed the issue of mutliculturalism in the core curriculum and have concluded that we definitely need to learn more about it. Furthermore, it disgusts me to see how its opponents have conducted themselves. As former vice-president of the College Republicans, I find their tactics especially deplorable. The letter and advertisements were indicative of an approach that destroys the very atmosphere this institution has aspired to provide.

Even within the club, I know that I am not alone in my criticism of the gimmicks employed. For me, my decision to divorce myself from the organization arose out of my convictions and values. I found their reasoning for the inclusion of the topics of homosexuality and abortion absolutely absurd. Many attended the open forum Nov. 21 expecting the sponsors to fulfill their promise of explaining how multiculturalism would undermine the foundations of the University. For the most part, the College Repubicans avoided the issue and warned that questions concerning their own claims were "wasting the speaker's time."

I sincerely hope that other issues facing this campus in the future will be handled in a much more appropriate and civil manner.

Republicans respond

To the Editor:

As a leader of the Villanova College Republicans, I would like to respond to the scurrilous attacks made upon the club in the Villanovan by a handful of supertrendy faculty and administrators who are advocating a new politicized curriculum.

They accused the College Republicans of using a "smokescreen of faith and Christianity" to disguise "hatred, bigotry and prejudice" and they suggested that the College Republicans were guilty of promoting a hidden political agenda. In the same breath, these employees of the University admitted that theirs was a political agenda advocating a one-sided interpretation of history that views it as a continuous battle between oppressor and oppressed.

This brand of indoctrination, which they label "multiculturalism," stereotypes all individuals as either members of the oppressor or oppressed class, based on the person's gender, race, and class.

Neither the letter nor the advertisement placed in the Villanovan was "misleading, unsubstantiated," or "reactionary" as the paper claimed in its editorial. The letter was based on what has happened at other campuses that instituted politicized curricula, including Penn State and Penn.

It is unfortunate that some members of the Villanova community, at least a few vocal faculty members and administrators, are against rational and open debate on the question of whether or not Villanova should radically alter its mission.

Why not campaign for community in the dorms?

By SEAN FERRIER

The Department of Public Safety recently added new security measures that affect residents of the second and third floors of St. Mary Hall. Effective Nov. 4, all residents are required to show a valid University identification card (ID) between 10:30 p.m. and 7 a.m. to gain entry to the dormitories. The cards are checked by Public Safety's housing security unit. While a similar policy is in effect throughout South Campus and most female resident halls, the St. Mary's policy has been implemented differently. The security officer checking identification is stationed on the second floor landing of the stairway, rather than at the front door.

The initial student reaction to this procedure was negative. I would like to highlight some of the unsettling points of the new procedure. First is the question of why Security must be stationed on the landing rather than at the front door. If the purpose of this precaution is to keep unwanted visitors out, logic states that the best place to effect the measure is at the front door. Other dormitories operate in this manner.

What type of image does this convey to resident students? While security of the dorm is important, other interests of the resident hall communities are being neglected by the current arrangement. Significantly, the responsibilities of the Resident Assistants are being diminished. If I consider myself a member of a dormitory community, then I am apt to perceive the current measure as an intrusion into my home to "keep order." It is one thing to have security at the front door, quite another to have them watching the stairwells.

It seems to me that the most lasting initiatives to address dormitory security would include Resident Assistants and resident students as partners.

By its action, Public Safety is setting itself up to enforce policies which are under the primary jurisdiction of the Resident Life staff. Three specific points come to mind: quiet hours and the alcohol and visitation policies. As a resident of St. Mary's, I feel that I am old enough to resent the idea of a "Big Brother" with a badge making sure I am in bed at a decent hour. No, thank you, I am in college now; I sleep little and I would like very much to pass my courses.

In residence halls, the maintenance of proper conduct should be the primary domain of Residence Life, represented by the Resident Assistants. The Resident Assistants are not merely police officers for the institution. Rather, they occupy a much more effective position. They are in the best practical position to build harmony between residents and the University.

In an ideal dorm community at Villanova, a cooperation between Resident Assistants and the members of the hall would foster a sense of shared goals and a mutually understood social contract. This situation would eliminate the need for Public Safety in the hallway. In most instances, the residents' community would be self-sufficient.

In this year of the "Campaign for Community" we should not only begin to understand other cultures, but we should also build and strengthen our own environment. Doesn't this effort demand that we listen and respond to the members of our own community?

The University seems to prefer imposing regulations regarding environmental needs from the top level, while ignoring the possibility of putting energy into interests that originate at the student level. This is simply another name for developing a sense of loyalty among students: loyalty to their hallmates, to shared interests and to the University itself.

It seems to me that the most lasting initiatives to address dormitory security would include the Resident Assistants and the resident students as partners. The Blue Book states that "creation of a safe and peaceful environment ... is the responsibility of every community member." The University should begin to look at a student-run method of approaching environmental concerns. Perhaps the formulation of some sort of honor code would represent a way of making the students themselves, rather that an adversarial corps of Resident Assistants and Public Safety officers, immediately responsible for maintaining a code of student conduct.

Sean Ferrier is a junior Honors major and a resident of St. Mary's Hall.

Remember Lenahan

To the Editor:

A tremendous loss was endured by friends and family of Lawrence Lenahan this past summer. Included in this loss was the Villanova community. Larry Lenahan tragically drowned off the Long Island coast on a shark fishing excursion, July 17.

Larry would have been a senior this year. The many people who knew Larry will miss his warm smile, friendly face and endearing demeanor. Very visible on campus, Larry was an active brother of Pi Kappa Phi, most recently serving as social chairman.

The word synonymous with Larry is love. His love for family and friends was, and I am sure continues to be, insurmountable. Even more impressive was Larry's loving nature towards those with which he was less intimate. For these people, Larry always seemed to go out of his way, either taking extra time to stop and speak with them or welcoming them to his house, or any activity, with so much hospitality that they would never want to leave.

This Sunday, Dec. 8, at 4 p.m. in the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center the members of the Villanova community are invited to celebrate the love of Lawrence Lenahan at a mass in his memory. I urge all to attend.

The memory of Pearl Harbor remains strong

By ELLEN GOODMAN

We are getting ready to celebrate the golden anniversary of a dark day and images of the past are already oozing up like oil from the hulk of the U.S.S. Arizona.

The Movietone news shots of Zeros and subs and ships in flames are out of storage. There are interviews with survivors. A grandfather remembers a friend who died on the deck beside him and cries as if he were 19 and not 69.

The elders who were at home tell about the day the world exploded into their America-first living rooms. Where were you when you heard?

It looks like Dec. 7, 1991, is going to be a day to relive the infamy.

But there are other snapshots as well for this 50th anniversary. At Pearl Harbor, a former Navy aircraft mechanic who survived the attack guides visitors around the memorial. These people come from Tokyo as well as Toledo. "It was a long time ago," he tells a reporter. "Too long for hate to linger."

On the mainland, those who remember the war and their grandchildren watch the reruns of this grim "opening day" on Japanese-made television sets with Japanese-made cars in the garage. And while some grumble — "who won the war?" — few think of the Japanese as enemies.

As an American born too late for such memories, I hear all sorts of mixed messages in this orgy of history. But the ones that resonate the most in our world are about the moral costs of both forgetting and remembering the past. History is alive, not just in the Pacific, but in Eastern Europe and the Middle East and everywhere people wrangle over wrongs.

Remember "Remember Pearl Harbor?" The price of forgetting any searing moment is the fear that we will do some injustice to innocent lives that were lost or forever changed. Making bygones into bygones can weaken the claim victims have on our collective sympathy. One cataclysm settles back into what we call historic perspective ... that endless sequence of cataclysms.

But remembering with an intensity that remains undiminished over time and generations, destines people to live in the past. we become the curators of our ancestors' grievances.

What was the George Santayana line? "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." Well, those who remember too well are also condemned to repeat it. To be stuck in feuds far more ancient than the Hatfields and McCoys.

In this, the year of our 50th anniversary, the Serbs and Croats are murdering each other, calling up ancient hostilities from as long ago as 800 years. In the rest of Eastern Europe where history itself was occupied by the Soviets, ethnic hostilities have re-emerged, dangling their roots. And those are modern memories compared to the biblical datelines over land disputes in the Middle East.

There is no excuse for sending the past down the memory hole. The final assault of the Holocaust is the "revisionists" denial of the Holocaust. Even a Toyota-driving American is uneasy hearing that the young Japanese know more about Hiroshima than about Pearl Harbor. Not long ago, a Japanese professor told of a junior high school student who thought Pearl Harbor was where her countrymen dive for Mikimoto pearls. But how do any of us acknowlege the past and honor it without being trapped in it?

Historian Carol Gluck at Columbia University makes the case for remembrance, reflection and responsibility. "We don't want to transmit all the burdens of the past," she says. "We're not looking for a constant open wound. What we need is remembrance for those who died and the 'day that will live in infamy.' We need reflection for understanding how it really happened. We need to take responsibility for the past and therefore the present and future."

In the past half-century the Japanese and the Americans, separately and together, have filled a new memory bank. Not always an easy task, but without amnesia or vengenance. So this week, we remember Pearl Harbor, but in its proper place: the past.

Klein refutes charges

To the Editor:

There was a personal, malicious attack upon my intergrity in a recent issue of the Villanovan. Mark Weed charged that my article entitled "Falsehoods Dominate Arab and Islamic Lectures" issue was filled with inaccuracies. Strangely, Weed did not refute a single statement in my article. Instead, he offers vague and generalized emotional condemnations. Implicit in his harangue is that I am the only person on earth criticizing the Villanova Center for Arab and Islamic Studies for its anti-U.S., anti-Israel program. But, in fact, there are growing numbers of public (as well as private) critics who can only harm Villanova's excellent reputation in its other academic programs.

Among these published critics are Dr. Franklin Littell, a Methodist minister who was former chairman and professor of religion at Temple University. He wrote, "The Villanova Center for Arab and Islamic Studies is a propaganda mill for pro-PLO and anti-Israel exercises." Professor Libby Levin of Villanova's English department was quoted in an article as saying "that speakers (at the Villanova Arab Center) made it seem as if the Israelis were the Nazis." The lectures were "slanted," and attempted to "mold" the students. "I was really shocked" by the Arab Center's lectures, said Levin.

In a recent article Dr. Jerrold Franklin, professor of physics at Temple, wrote "during past symposia at Villanova (Arab Center), some of the most outrageous anti-Israel literature, such as booklets about 'Israeli Genocide of Palestinians,' were readily available to participants." Also, Rabbi Howard Alpert, director of the Jewish Campus Activities Board and the Hillel Houses in the Philadelphia area, wrote that "anti-Israel activity on campuses in this area is very low ... except at Villanova University," and that "the Villanova Arab Center regularly conducts anti-Israel lectures." And Dr. Don Goelman of Villanova's computer science program published a letter saying "many of us ... have been concerned with the increasing and one-sided politicization of the Villanova Center for Arab and Islamic Studies and we appreciate Mr. Klein's efforts to report on the Center's activities."

Even Dr. Thomas Ricks, assistant director of the Villanova Arab Center, privately complained to me about certain false statements the Arab Center's public lecturers made. But, he added, "I can't control what these people say." Ricks also acknowledged to me that his textbook which he co-authored "Middle East: Past and Present" has some serious anti-Israel errors which he promised to revise in the upcoming edition. He also admitted to never having had one pro-Israel speaker on campus under the Center's auspices, but promised to rectify that as well.

I hope Father Dobbin, president of Villanova, and Father Ellis, director of the Villanova Center for Arab and Islamic Studies, do all they can to insure integrity and fairness of this Arab Center's programs and prevent any further loss of Villanova University's high standards and reputation.

Debate continues

To the Editor:

Students and others seeking to defeat the proposed multicultural curriculum are falling prey to the very ignorance the planned courses seek to eradicate.

Villanova's teachings have always been based on the fundamental tenets of Catholicism. The teachings of these tenets can only be strenghtened by a greater knowledge of other ways of life.

The multicultural curriculum is not about teaching and rationalizing homosexuality and abortion. However, even if these were topics of discussion, fears that they would result in the proliferation of that lifestyle are totally unfounded, just as discussion of the seven deadly sins in theology is unlikely to produce such transgressions.

We at Villanova can only survive with complete and uncensored knowledge. Picking and choosing what knowledge we accumulate will leave us only half-educated. A half-educated individual is more dangerous to the Church and to the community than one totally without education, simply because they now have the pretense of knowledge without knowledge itself.

"The Concerned Students of Villanova," who signed their Nov. 8 letter protesting the new core curriculum, must look inside themselves to understand there is a broader world outside.

Multicultural issue spurs a heated debate

By MONTA MONACO
Features Editor

Below the surface of this seemingly stable, mild-mannered Catholic institution brews an issue called multiculturalism and, more specifically, the part it will play in the revised version of Villanova's core curriculum. Many students at Villanova are "the innocents," not knowing that the University is even contemplating a change in curriculum. The College Republicans, however, have done their best to turn on the heat. The topic is now bubbling at the surface perhaps to explode into one of the greatest controversies at Villanova in a while.

According to Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, the idea of a core curriculum in general arose from the fact that, when left with total freedom, students would randomly pick courses without any kind of understanding of the "connection" of the learning experience.

In 1988, a committee was started at Villanova to redefine the core curriculum. Among the sources this committee took into consideration was a study done by the Association of American Colleges called "Integrity in the College Curriculum — A Report to the Academic Community." In this study are listed nine components believed to be necessary for a "coherent undergraduate education." Among them are inquiry and critical analysis, literacy, understanding numerical data, historical consciousness, science, values, art, international and multicultural experience and study in depth.

Upon analysis of Villanova's core curriculum, Ellis said that the committee decided this University is lacking in the multicultural component. The study states "the fragility of the world in which we live and the volatile diversity of the population of the United States adds urgency to the need for international and multicultural experience in the course of study."

The committee examining the core curriculum also saw this urgency as they sought to instate a multicultural component to the core requirements at Villanova.

The resulting proposal would only apply to liberal arts and sciences students and would require students to search out classes that focus on the experiences of ethnic people, minorities and women and classes that focus on countries and cultures outside of the western world. A multicultural and international adjustment would be made to the core curriculum requiring that students take one course in each of the two areas.

The classes that would meet the requirements are already offered at Villanova, Helen K. Lafferty, associate dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences said. She feels that the requirement helps the students search out those courses that provide this opportunity for study. Apparently, there would be a core curriculum committee that would designate the appropriate courses.

When word of these new requirements broke out, "The Concerned Students of Villanova" circulated flyers stating that they believe "Multiculturalism is not directed at the understandings of other cultures. Rather, it rationalizes homosexuality and abortion, as well as breaching the principles upon which Villanova University was founded."

Soon after, the College Republicans printed an advertisement in the Villanovan asking, "Should Villanova students be forced to take classes such as those which legitimize gay rights and abortion?" They offered an open forum to discuss the "possible negative implications of the newly proposed curriculum."

"I just find this amazingly absurd," said Ellis. "It's hard to see how anyone with any intelligence could take that ad seriously."

Lafferty agreed, "This proves the point that people don't know what multiculturalism is." She was baffled by the fact that the word multiculturalism could be applied to gay rights and abortion. "The real richness of what has been discussed gets lost because of this kind of translation," she said.

Insisting that the project was not a haphazard investigation, Lafferty confirmed that all aspects of the Villanova community were involved in the process — students, faculty, alumni, advisors. Both Ellis and Lafferty concurred that the point of the project was to see if the existing core provided students the courses of study that develop the characteristics of well

Does a multicultural curriculum fit in a traditional Catholic institution?

SASS targets gender issues

By PEGGY AGOLINO
Assistant Features Editor

What exactly is the multicultural curriculum? Why is it causing such controversy? Who is really going to benefit? These questions and many others have been raised recently because of Villanova's new curriculum proposal. Regardless of how the issue is solved, it has raised an awareness of some topics that are not often openly discussed. An organization on campus that has been continually striving for awareness about one of these topics is Students Against Sexual Stereotyping (SASS).

SASS originated in 1984 as a women's studies organization. About four years ago three women, Tracey Burke, Mimi Gleason and Nancy Hensler, came to be in charge of the group and decided to change the name to SASS. "We wanted the group to be more gender-inclusive. So we changed the name," said Hensler. The group is growing, and according to its advisor Barbara Wall, O.P., it is interested in hosting programs to discuss issues such as sexual harassment and stereotyping with students and faculty. "The group focuses on ways in which myths and stereotypes about women and men have been cultural forces responsible for mutual exploitation," said Wall. Last year a major activity was their "Take Back the Night March," which is an annual event on many college campuses designed to voice concerns about rape, abuse of women on campus and violence that is perpetrated on women. SASS meets every Thursday at 7 p.m. in the Center for Peace and Justice Education. It welcomes new members of both sexes.

Michelle Rossi is a director in the group and says she joined for many reasons. When she came to Villanova she encountered stereotypes in several areas, the graffiti in the library carols, for example. In a conversation with another student she was forced to deal with the fact that many view women as coming to Villanova not for an education, but to find a husband. She has always wanted to help others and is deeply concerned about issues such as rape and the battering of women. She felt through SASS she could work toward breaking the stereotypes with which women and men are raised by creating awareness of the problem.

Lynne Curry, president of SASS, shares Rossi's views. The treatment that she felt she and other women received at a party one of her first weekends at Villanova was a strong motivating force for her. "Seeing that the real world isn't like the campus motivated me to get involved. Education is very important — women need to know how to depend on themselves," said Curry.

Bob Parks is one of the few male members of the group. He has been active in the organization of several discussions and events.

"I joined because it was a matter of principle, I thought I could do something to stop sexual stereotyping," said Parks. He feels the issue at Villanova is manifested in subtle ways; for example, it is more acceptable for men to dress in a sloppy way for class than it is for women.

All members stress that SASS is not just about feminism, but is about sexism and how it affects both women and men. Their goal is to raise awareness of this issue. SASS's goals directly relate to the goals of a multicultural curriculum in several aspects. Jeaneen Riely, the moderator of the group, feels encouraged by the open

Core Curriculum philosophy centers on diversity issue

Special to the Villanovan

The core curriculum seeks to promote intellectual curiosity and rigor within the University, to instill the fundamentals of critical insight, mature judgment, and independent thinking. The courses in the core treat a broad range of disciplines from a variety of approaches; at the same time, the core strives to ensure depth of study and intellectual sophistication, while recognizing that learning implies different modes of inquiry. Fact-learning alone is not enough to justify the existence of the core; rather, its purpose is to achieve a synthesis of knowledge that provides a basis for informed judgment. The core also seeks to promote literacy as a foundation for intelligent discourse and the articulation of informed views.

The core aims to advance culture in a broad sense, educating students to understand and to appreciate the interrelated patterns of customary beliefs and practices, social forms, aesthetics, and material traits that act to "define" a culture and its position within a larger historical and intellectual framework. The educational program does not simply look to the past, but acknowledges that culture is vibrant and continuously redefined. The core challenges students to understand that the present is recognizably formed from past influences, and that in order to assess our culture and arrive at a view of its future, students must be trained to scrutinize and bring into perspective the relationship of the present culture with that of the past.

In fostering active participation in learning, the core likewise prepares students to become active participants within society, to engage in the process of informed, political debate, and to encourage an understanding and appreciation of the diversity of cultures and experiences, a respect for the individual, and the development of a multicultural and international perspective.

Business school discusses curriculum

Dr. Alvin Clay, dean of Commerce and Finance

By SETON M. ALVES
Senior Reporter

It surely is a small world after all, and the expanding business world serves as proof. With large American corporations seeking headquarters overseas and expanding companies striving for global markets, the blending of various economies and cultures is imminent. While all this is occurring in the real world of commerce and finance, is it not logical that business students be provided with a multicultural background?

In theory, multiculturalism is a vital aspect of any business curriculum. However, the desire to present specifically multicultural courses to business students at Villanova is thwarted by practical concerns. Dr. Alvin Clay, dean of Commerce and Finance, explained that the rigorous business school curriculum must satisfy the requirements of several accreditation and licensing agencies in addition to those of the University. After the students complete the required courses, "they only have three or four electives left," said Clay. "Foreign languages are my toughest problem. In order to get language in, I'd have to require it." Clay also noted that providing such multicultural courses as foreign languages would require additional staff and course sections. "It's one thing I'd like, but one thing I'd find difficult to do," said Clay. In short, the business school has much less flexibility than arts.

Despite the hindrances of practical concerns and logistics, Clay added that the business school, as it is now, does not suffer from a lack of multiculturalism. "We are already multicultural in a sense," said Clay. "This is not something new to business courses." He explained that there are very few companies that are not international companies, disregarding this fact would be harmful to any business curriculum. Clay stressed that students in the business school must understand the aspects of international business. "The best way is to get to know the culture and the people. How to achieve this understanding must be taught in all business disciplines," said Clay.

Presently, all business students must take at least one semester each of a social science and a behavioral science as well as a course in business and society. "These are all arts courses," said Clay. "They are part of the core curriculum." Clay added that these courses tackle multicultural issues although they may not be designed specifically as such.

"Essentially, the principles of business are the same throughout the world," said Clay, "but cultural differences affect these same basic principles." Clay added that existing business courses address this fact. He explained that understanding other cultures means much more than knowing currency conversion factors. Still, he

Dobbin discusses 'Nova's stance on multculturalism

Is the University's commitment to diversity a long range focus?

"Yes, this is a long range program. This is really referred to as a diversity component, but first of all there is already a great deal of focus on these issues throughout the various disciplines.

"Our understanding for the long term is that appreciation of cultural differences will suffuse the whole curriculum even in the sciences and even in business.

"Business is more and more international all of the time. The need to appreciate cultural differences is very pragmatic.

"Rather than splintering the curriculum, the whole purpose of this is to unify it and make sure all students have certain basic intellectual skills with which they can then benefit from the broader curriculum."

Recently, there has been concern expressed by faculty and students that the core may promulgate political agenda setting. Should students worry about agenda setting within the core requirement?

"There is always a choice the student must select one from among many courses. We are concerned more with the general appreciation of difference.

"We would not designedly present a political advocacy within the curriculum. The purpose of the curriculum is students' understanding and sensitivity to difference. That's not a political issue in itself."

Should students fear that their Catholic faith may be threatened by these issues?

"I don't think you should fear ideas, you should tackle them, grapple with them and think about them. If a student has a question and feels a teacher may try to snowball the issue, they can always go to other teachers to raise the question.

"I am convinced that you come to understand your own faith better when seeing it in contrast with others."

Is the University willing to open dialogue on contemporary issues that may conflict with Catholic doctrine, ie. homosexuality, abortion, birth control, alternate theories?

"People have to understand these issues, otherwise, they are not able to deal with them outside the University. There is no topic of conversation that cannot be debated in an intellectual environment. So, we are committed to that academic freedom. At the same time the University will not become an advocacy power behind some political agenda."

Professors should not present just one side of an issue?

"I'm in favor of professors presenting the information and framing the issues of the debate carefully and responsibly. I am confident that our faculty has that level of capability and commitment to truth."

The controversial advertisement in the Villanovan and the anonymous letter at Homecoming brought up issues that may conflict with Catholic doctrine. Should issues conflicting with Catholic doctrine be shunned from the classroom?

"As a theologian, I am steeped in the history of Catholic doctrine. Basically, it has been a history of debate and conflict. If you were to walk into a University and there were no discussion of these issues, I'd say the place was dead.

"The whole history of the church has been, and the major doctrines of the church were, usually forged through debate and difference and so on.

"To me, to have people arguing over religious and ethical issues is a plus. When things are real bad is when people don't care about them ...

"They are issues of importance in our society and therefore if we shelter our students from discussion of these things we are not educating our students."

Can a group on campus host a speaker who advocates issues contrary to Catholic doctrine?

"We are not closed to ideas, at the same time we don't like to be used by outside groups. Usually, we'd be very open to people who are chosen inside, but there are various outside groups that would just love to prey upon an institution like this.

"People could use us as a platform for advocacy of a position that is antithetical to what we stand for. Are we going to have a Klu Klux Klanner in to address us? Well, depending on the circumstances. He might just show the ignorance of his position. I use that as an example ... We would have a regular process we would go through, again, if the speaker were not taking advantage of the institution's position but would be invited appropriately by internal constituency in a context of a debate where an intelligent discussion and where positions could be aired. We are in favor of that.

"We are an institution that is open to ideas, and to the exploration of ideas. We just don't want to be manipulated by outside groups."

Can a student be well educated without the knowledge of other cultures?

Diversity applauded

By STACEY GIBERTI
Staff Reporter

At the end of the 19th century, the United States was known world wide as the cultural melting pot. People from a variety of nations poured into the country and settled together. After several generations, most nationalities assimilated. Today, the United States is concerned about a lack of interest for other nations and cultures. This problem is often discussed under the term multiculturalism.

The Villanova campus may appear at first glance to lack diversity. However, when one really looks, one will find many perspectives on multiculturalism available at Villanova.

Dr. Estrella B. Ogden, chairperson of the modern language department, expressed that Americans have to become more open to foreign cultures. Ogden feels that Villanova is striving toward a multicultural campus with the new plans it is implementing.

"It will not happen overnight. We need to implement programs and stress the benefits that an individual will gain from them," stated Ogden.

Ogden also expressed that it is more important to learn a foreign language for the overall benefits it will yield than as a mandatory requirement of the university. "Today, with the increasing awareness of other countries, we need to pay more attention to a global education in both languages and communication," Ogden said.

The best way for students to become more open to foreign societies is by studying in and visiting foreign nations. "The interest in study abroad is growing," stated Ogden. The language department currently offers six-week summer programs in Chili, France, Germany, Italy and Spain. "After these programs, students gain interest in the richness of other cultures," said Ogden. These students often continue on to receive a major or minor in the language of the country in which they studied.

Sabrina Biscardi, a Villanova student from France, offers another perspective on the issue. Biscardi grew up in France and Italy and lived in several other countries, including the United States, due to her father's job. Biscardi said that the modern language department has been very helpful to her since her arrival and has offered her a variety of cultural diversity. "Most of my friends are international students," said Biscardi.

"It is hard to get people motivated in cultural activities at Villanova," Biscardi said.

Like Ogden, Biscardi expressed that American students gain a great deal from international study programs and travel. "American students abroad have a great deal of enthusiasm. They are not intimidated about making mistakes and learning from them," said Biscardi.

Elena Leon, a Villanova student from Puerto Rico, said, "Something needs to be done with the lack of cultural diversity on campus. As the world continues to become one, we need to become more concerned with other cultures." Leon feels more foreign students need to be enticed to attend Villanova in order to attain greater diversity.

Villanova students have the opportunity to become involved in over ten different cultural and language clubs. A new club, the Asian Cultural Society, recently formed to bring Asian students on campus together. One member, Joe Leung, said, "I would like to see more diversity on campus, like the real world. College is not just academic learning. It's learning about people."

'Novans realize stereotypes

discussion of these important topics.

"It is morally wrong not to open ourselves up to a multicultural curriculum. It is irresponsible. Students are entering an increasingly multicultural work force and are not prepared for it," said Riely.

Wall is also supportive of the program. "What is being asked is that given the fact that Villanova is committed to the education of the whole person, it educates students in ways that allows them to be more adequately informed about the world in which they live, a world where difference exists. This small change in the curriculum to explore differences is a beginning step in fulfilling our mission as educators," said Wall.

Curry and Rossi expanded on this by stating that "the multicultural curriculum could help alleviate ignorance by pointing out the different standards we measure men and women against in the same situations." A modern day situation that exemplifies this statement in many ways is the Clarence Thomas incident. According to Curry and Rossi, classic stereotypes were brought up in this case. Some examples of these are the assumption that Clarence Thomas was behind Anita Hill's success and the assumption that she (and women in general) could not have risen to her position alone. In situations such as this, knowing about stereotypes and the history of women can promote a greater understanding.

"The media today tends to portray women as simply body parts. Girls grow up feeling that superficial qualities are all they need to develop. Women are portrayed as just something to look at and then men get the idea that this is what women are supposed to be," said Curry. "Stereotypes hurt men and women and ignorance breeds misconception," said Rossi. Both feel that a multicultural curriculum can educate students to make their own judgements about issues. They may not agree with them, but they can learn to accept them.

For students who are interested in women's studies, it is available as a minor and a concentration. A variety of classes are offered under this program, including "Sociology of Sex Roles and Human Sexuality" and "Marriage and the Family." A pamphlet explaining the program and its requirements can be obtained in the Center for Peace and Justice Education in the basement of Sullivan Hall.

Another problem evident on Villanova's campus and around the country is salary inequity regarding men and women. Women are currently earning 59 cents for every dollar earned by a man. Professor June Lytel-Murphy of the English Department feels the inequity at Villanova is representative of the situation everywhere else. "The inequity in pay represents the inequity with which men deal with women," said Lytel-Murphy.

Campaign raises awareness

By GRETCHEN FISHER
Assistant Features Editor

Last year Villanova saw the success of a new program on campus entitled "Year of Diversity." Now called "Campaign for Community," its purpose, as explained in the mission statement, is "to provide a forum for the exchange of ideas and to promote openness and awareness of others, so that our differences can foster respect and understanding of all peoples."

The program began a year ago under the direction of Kerry Stromberg, last year's Student Government president. This year's Steering Committee, whose chairperson is Katie Roberts, decided to change the name to one which more aptly expresses the group's ongoing, inclusive nature and purpose.

One of Campaign for Community's objectives is to encourage the other student organizations to present opportunities for their members to discuss the people around them and sponsor events that enable others to do so. "We are basically here to see that students receive an education outside as well as inside the classroom," said Roberts.

This semester the members have been working to organize the campaign so that it can live up to its mission statement. Much dedication is required of those involved. In addition to sponsoring events, the group is also in the process of understanding how things work in the University and coming up with ideas for next semester.

One of the ways in which Campaign for Community cosponsors events with other student organizations is the presentations in the residence halls, cosponsored with Residence Life. Campaign for Community coordinated National AIDS Awareness Day on campus Mon., Dec. 2, sponsoring an information booth in Connelly with Student Activities Director Gary Bonas.

The Steering Committee is made up of 12 members who interviewed for their positions. Under the Steering Committee there are 11 sub-committees that focus on the various functions of the group, such as the Greek liaison, the cultural committee and the non-cultural committee. The office is located on the second floor of Dougherty for anyone who wishes to be involved.

Discussion is necessary to understand other people and their cultures. Talking about differences between cultures can help students develop a better understanding of their own. Campaign for Community promotes learning about the world around and including us. It promotes learning not only about others, but about ourselves as well. Roberts and Moderator Jeaneen Riely stress that the group is not politically affiliated. "As a campaign, we won't take a stance," Riely said. "We're just here to make sure discussion is happening."

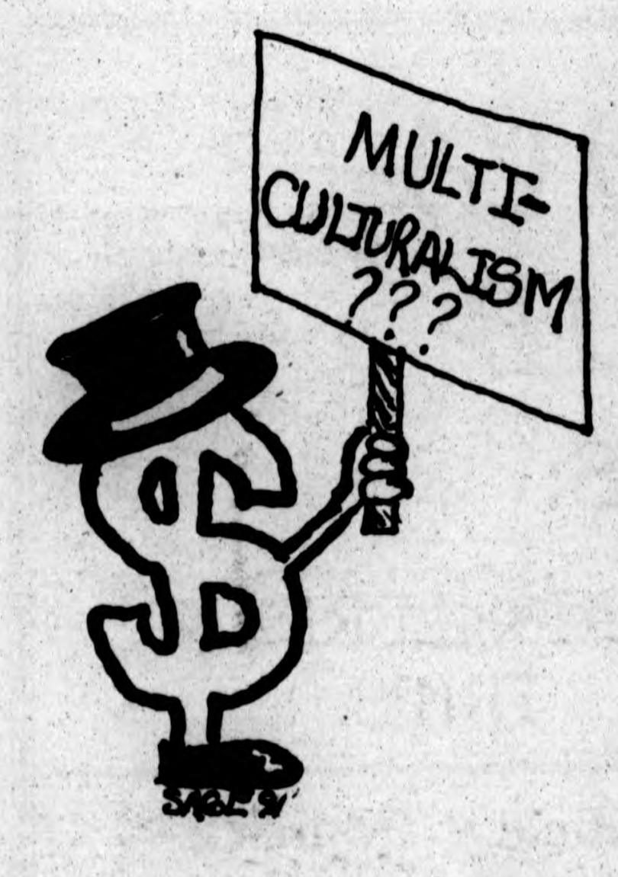
emphasized that such understanding need not come directly from the classroom. He sees travel and immersing oneself in another culture as an excellent way of achieving a truly multicultural perspective in the business world.

Clay proposed one solution to the question of additional multicultural courses in the business curriculum. "We could make it a single, comprehensive master of business administration program," said Clay. "We want to try to react to what will happen in business education in the future." Such an MBA program would allow more flexibility and space for specifically multicultural courses, in addition to addressing the needs of an increasingly global society.



Broadening multiculturalism in the business school is an aspect of a worldwide debate that has currently been bogged down by practical concerns in the University. One cannot argue that Villanova must prepare its business students to respond to the needs of a global society, but neither can one deny that such an education to accommodate these needs will require some careful planning.

Imagine taking classes at Villanova that require students to study homesexual authors and the issue of abortion as an alternative to having children. The new proposal for a multicultural core curriculum could include courses such as these.

Villanovans for Life is an organization on campus which intends to educate other students about issues concerning life in all stages, not just the abortion issue. "We try to educate students on important issues from the womb to the tomb," said Jeaneen Riely, coordinator of Peace and Justice Education.

"We should start preparing our students about culturalism at places like Villanova, and we should deal with the issues. It is nice to see students finally feeling passionate about something other than basketball," said Riely. The debate should continue so that it pulls in other students, but should not turn into a political issue, added Riely.

Villanovans for Life is not taking a stand either way on the multiculturalism issue. "We feel that it is not appropriate to support one side since some members of the group support it and some don't," said president Kristen Haaf. The only thing the group feels is that abortion is wrong.

The entire multiculturalism issue on campus is not wrong and does not offend Villanovans for Life. As a group, it has come to the decision that studying abortion in a class may not be completely wrong as long as the pro-life side of the issue is given a fair chance, said Haaf.

Multiculturalism is more a study of special interest groups than it is involving foreign cultures, said Haaf. "I would love to study other cultures, and I think it is great, but I have a problem with a westerner teaching me about another culture," added Haaf. The special interest group studies should be done away with, and we should just stick to the true studies of different culture, Haaf said. As a true definition, multiculturalism is great as long as it does not run contradictory to its initial goals.

The multiculturalism issue on other campuses has brought about the ideas that abortion is legitimized or homosexuality is an alternative lifestyle. The worry is that the same thing would happen here at Villanova, which contradicts the teachings of the Catholic church. "Professors should not shape their course syllabi to push one political agenda. It is irresponsible to push a political agenda," argued Haaf.

Students who question policies question them in order to find the truth and should not be punished or categorized for their inquiries, said Haaf. "People who do not accept homosexuality are considered homophobics, and those of us who question multiculturalism at Villanova have instantly been cast as bigots, racists and followers of David Duke. I don't think this is fair, and I don't like being called a bigot or racist because I support a free exchange of ideas and questions to find the truth," said Haaf.

Multiculturalism has the opportunity to become an important aspect of a Villanova education, but it needs to be identified in its true sense and cannot defeat its own goals, said Haaf.

Top 10

This week's TOP 10, straight from the intellectual ivory tower, is the TOP 10 things that will be legitimized as a result of the multiculturalism component of the new core curriculum:

10. "Abortion" (hee, hee)
9. "Homosexuality" (ha, ha)
8. Jaywalking
7. Income tax fraud
6. Defensive pass interference
5. Presidential assassinations
4. Yelling "Fire" in a crowded theater
3. Drunken hook-ups
2. Talking back to your mother

And the No. 1 thing legitimized by the multiculturalism component of the new core curriculum (where did those College Republicans come from, anyway) is:

1. Education

Multiculturalism debate rages among Villanovans

educated people, not to advocate gay rights and abortion.

The open forum that the College Republicans advertised in the Villanovan began with a lecture by Joseph Sobran, critic at large for the National Review magazine. He spoke of his views on the studying of other cultures.

"I am not forbidding anyone to study other cultures at all; I think it is desirable as long as you don't go into it with ideological preconceptions that predetermine the answers," Sobran said.

Sobran admitted that he was not aware of the advertisement in the Villanovan or the extent of the conflict at Villanova. A debate erupted when he was through speaking. The audience demanded to know the objections of the College Republicans to the proposed curriculum.

Frank Morgan, co-chairman of the College Republican's "Committee for a Liberal Education," summed up their fears. "There is an inherent difficulty in teaching multiculturalism objectively," he said.

"We are for multiculturalism, but the core curriculum says things such as contemporary ideas. Who is to decide the meaning of contemporary ideas? — the professor. By not defining these ideas correctly in the course description, they are lending it to political one-sidedness. If they could guarantee a mutual exchange of ideas, then it will be fine. We are worried that this program at other campuses does not lend itself to teaching both sides or multiple sides of any question," Mark Wittman, treasurer for the College Republicans, said.

The audience proved to have some passionate convictions about the issue of multiculturalism as well.

"Multicultural agenda, yes, it is political — just like your agenda is political. But the political nature of the multicultural agenda is the question of whether or not we are going to open and expand the format of the academy as it exists now. Are you going to let other people come in and say what their experiences are? Textbooks talk about my culture simply as being a slave," Maghan Keita, history professor, said. He accused the College Republicans of not wanting to accept the issue that this is a multicultural country.

"As a Roman Catholic, I would just like to say that, in terms of the issues that I've heard in these ads, I am very concerned that the smokescreen of God is being used to cover up hatred, bigotry and prejudice and I find that blasphemous," Barbara E. Wall, O.P., director for the Center for Peace and Justice Education, said.

In an interview with Wittman following the debate, he further explained how the College Republicans became involved with the issue and came to associate the term multiculturalism with gay rights and abortion. When the College Republicans heard about the issue, they were concerned with the fact that the students did not know enough about the situation. The Committee for Liberal Education was founded within the College Republicans' organization to look into the issue of multiculturalism, Wittman said.

The group conducted a great deal of research on its own, and examined how multiculturalism was handled at other universities. "We came out totally against this because what it has been in other universities is not multiculturalism. It has been oppressed studies. It is not teaching about the people and their background. It is teaching you about hardships they may face, but not all of them will obviously face in this country. Who's to say who is getting the correct gist of those hardships?" Wittman said.

"It's good to study other cultures, but let's study real cultures. Let's study what made these cultures that are now in our country great. You don't just study some little article that is contemporary. Who knows what basis it will have years from now?"

Wittman cited texts such as the Upanishads that "represent the sacred spiritual teaching for the Hindus." He acknowledged that Hindus are a very big culture in the world that there is a big population of them in America, and that the Upanishads are the kind of works that would make a multicultural class legitimate.

In regards to where the insinuations that multiculturalism could be tied in with gay rights and abortion, Wittman referred to a passage from an article in which a teacher at another university stated how she always began her women's studies class. The passage read, "I begin the course with the basic feminine principle that in a racist, sexist society, we have all swallowed oppressive ways of being, whether intentionally or not. Specifically this means that it is not open to debate whether a white student is racist or a male student is sexist. He or she just simply is. Rather the focus is on the social forces that keep these distortions in place."

Wittman said that he took some of the social forces that the passage talked about to mean homosexuals. "Obviously, if you are racist or sexist, along with that comes whether you are a gay basher or not; so they start to talk about the forces of oppression on gays, and by doing that they are legitimizing gays," he said.

When asked his opinion of what a Catholic education meant, Wittman responded, "There is nothing wrong with tying in the other side that is not Catholic. There is nothing wrong with mentioning gays or talking about pro-abortion issues. We are just saying that we don't want those

Women were not always a common sight on Villanova's campus. Professor Dan Regan of the Philosophy Department came to Villanova in 1965 when the only women here were nursing students and daughters of faculty members. He recalls that most welcomed the active recruitment of women. Father Jack O'Rourke, who attended Villanova in 1953, recalls a bit of uneasiness when the situation arose. Villanova at that time had 700 men and eight women. The school then realized separate facilities were needed, so a student lounge was given to women even though they were in the minority. O'Rourke and other students challenged the administration because the school made a decision without planning for it and without having the proper facilities. O'Rourke said it was this lack of planning and not the admittance of women that was protested.

A final issue that needs to be discussed is campus rape. According to Jeff Horton, head of Public Safety, four rapes were reported last year, which does not mean that only four occurred. There were also reports of other sexual assaults on campus. "Sexual harassment is a problem that is dealt with all the time," said Horton.

Professor Janice McLane, an advisor on the Rape Task Force at Villanova, feels it is important to have rape education programs in residence halls, fraternities, sororities, athletic teams, etc. She also feels a multicultural curriculum can help awaken people to the difficulties women face. However, individual reaction cannot be predicted. "For some, education will increase awareness, for others anger and resentment will surface. However, in general, it will improve tolerance and awareness," said McLane.

SASS stands for issues that affect all of us. "Villanova has come a long way, but we still need to open up to stereotyping in its subtle forms. They are doing a great job of bringing issues to the forefront — these topics are important and need to be discussed by everyone," said Hensler.

to be one-sided issues. By only bringing up the gays' rights or abortion rights, you are discounting the Catholic tradition of what we are supposed to be teaching at a Catholic institution — being pro-life and that there is no question that in the Bible gays are looked down upon."

In response to Wall calling the College Republicans racist, Wittman said, "A lot of times in heated debates on this issue, the side that is pushing for multiculturalism will call racism because they cannot back it up. She cannot call anyone of us a racist, as she does not know us or what we've said. It was just a very uncalculated remark on her part and, as far as I am concerned, she should apologize to us in the paper or in person."

A few professors discussed the issue in their classrooms after the flyers were originally circulated. Dr. Susan Mackey Kallis, communication arts professor, was one of these people. "I think that the College Republicans are just acting as political gadflies to stir up fear in a worst case and to debate in the best case about the issue of multicultural diversity. I hope that this fosters constructive debate about the role that multiculturalism will play, but it won't open up for debate unless the College Republicans stop using such extremist language ... They are playing on people's fears by distorting what multiculturalism is all about," she said.

Before coming to Villanova, Mackey-Kallis taught at Queens' College, which she feels is a culturally diverse institution. "Villanova tends to draw from a white middle class population and therefore, since they don't havethe literal diversity, they should be enlightened academically about cultural issues," she said.

On whether or not Villanova is diverse, Lafferty agrees that statistically, with minorities the campus doesn't fare well. Because of this, she says that the administration has taken steps to enrich students' knowledge of diversity. "If we don't have the numbers in our minority population, we are doing our best to educate our students so they will know that they belong to a global society," she said.

Take a walk on the Southside

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Southside Johnny spoke to David J. Criblez in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Some old habits die hard. Southside Johnny's got one and he cannot shake it. He cannot stay away from rock-n-roll. He returns to his familiar terrain bringing along some old friends for the ride as he and his Asbury Jukes get in gear for Better Days. Produced by old time Jukemaster Little Steven Van Zandt, Days has ol' Southside smiling a lot lately. His R&B meets rock-n-roll style seems to shine in a decade where most music is made from a computer. No, not for Johnny. He makes his the old fashioned way ... through live instruments.

VILLANOVAN: What keeps you and the heart of your music centered in New Jersey?

SOUTHSIDE JOHNNY: "I moved to California to get a change from the East where things got to be predictable. But, I moved to L.A. to write about New Jersey. It's like the old cliche, if you move away from what you know it puts things back into perspective. It makes you write better. It's like Tom Waits once said, 'I never missed the East Coast till I moved to the west.' It's true."

V: How does Better Days fit into your musical realm? Do you see it as a new beginning or rather a traditional Southside Johnny record?

SOUTHSIDE: "It's basically both. It's a traditional sound. But, it's a record we couldn't have made five years ago cause we know so much more now. Everything you do, every record I take another step. Sometimes it makes you turn back a bit, but that's why I called it Better Days. It's like saying we've had a colorful past but let's transfer that energy to the present as well."

V: How long have you had the Jukes and what exactly is a Juke?

SOUTHSIDE: "I started the Jukes in 1974. There have been changes in personnel over the years but it still remains an R&B band with horns and rock-n-roll underpinnings. The term Juke, on the other hand, is an African slang term for fun or good time. A juke is the type of joint where they played blues and sold bootleg liquor. Then self-reliant musical machines came along, hence the jukebox."

V: Did you grow up as an inner city kid or rather did you come from a more suburban setting?

SOUTHSIDE: "I grew up in Ocean Grove, a Methodist retirement community. But, Asbury Park, the next city over, is where we spent our time as kids. I had the best of both worlds. We'd go and party in Asbury Park ... causing trouble much like the things you young people do today and then we'd go to Ocean Grove. Grove had like five policemen, four of which were asleep, so we were safe and in danger at the same time."

V: What did you grow up listening to?

SOUTHSIDE: "I grew up on R&B. My parent listened to Big Joe Turner, Ray Charles and blue great T-Bone Walker. It was all so full of life, then came. the Stones, the Yardbyrds and Hendrix. We seeked that guitar crunch and mixed it with a horn section and a back beat. Now I listen to everything from early western to Sonic Youth. It's actually all in the spirit."

V: Being from New Jersey and playing American rock-n-roll, you must get compared to Bruce Springsteen a lot. Does this bother you in anyway? Do you feel trapped in his shadow?

SOUTHSIDE: "People take me for who I am, especially nowadays. I don't worry about those things. Yes, some of our music overlaps but the bulk is varied. He is a very serious artisan and I'm the wild on-stage front man. But the main ties that pulls us close is that we are both very concerned with pleasing the audience and we do what we want at the same time."

V: Speaking of Bruce, you collaborated on, "It's Been a Long Time" vocally as well as Bruce writing, "All the Way Home." Has your friendship remained strong over the years?

SOUTHSIDE: "It comes and goes. He's tough to get a hold of sometimes. It's not like we live down the street from each other and play catch every night. Little Steven and Jon Bon Jovi (Bon Jovi) are old friends of the past too. The song we sing together suggests the feeling that we were trying to capture the period in your life when you decide who you are. If

Cast excels in 'Sons'

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

As the second production of its "Season of Just Desserts," the Villanova Theatre is currently presenting "All My Sons." The Arthur Miller play offers an emotionally powerful portrait of an American family dealing with ethical issues and the wartime death of one son.

Mark Conti gives an excellent performance as Joe Keller, a man confronted with the clash between his roles as father and business man. Conti brings a high level of realism to his character and allows the audience to feel sympathy for Joe in his personal struggle to justify his actions. Conti's extensive acting experience is displayed through his dramatic abilities, an important asset to the play.

Mimi Smith's performance as Kate reveals her strong background in the theater as she brings a sensitive yet strong quality to the character. Russ Widdall portrays the frustrated and idealistic son Chris. Widdall's energetic portrayal, together with the performances of Conti and Smith, provide a believable portrait of relationships between parents and children. Widdall's scenes with Conti are particularly excellent as they indicate the tension and power struggle which are so often a part of family discussions.

Fishbone rocks at Tower

By JOHN KOLMER
Senior Reporter

"Welcome to the Fishbone Show," shouted an unseen announcer whose voice eerily resembled that of Don Pardo. The noise from the already excited throng of fans grew to a fevered pitch as members of one of music's premier "funk-core" ska bands took the stage at the Tower Theater Nov. 22.

This unusual beginning, intending to imitate a cheesy game show or sitcom from the '70s, reflects one of Fishbone's primary aims: to have fun, and a fun time was definitely in the works. Opening with "Post Cold War Politics," an instrumental dominated by the sound of every band member laughing, Fishbone reenforced this idea of mirth.

A serious side does exist within the Fishbone mindset, however, as was evident by the choice of the songs that immediately followed "Politics": "Subliminal Fascism" and "Fight the Youth." Social and political concerns have been growing in Fishbone's music since its first album, but, up until recently, it has been shrouded in humor.

This facet of the band's personality is apparent in most of the songs performed at the Tower. Songs such as "So Many Millions" and "Pray to the Junkiemaker" are cries against poverty and drug abuse respectively, but the band conveys this message within a lively performance context so that the concert mood is still intense.

Fishbone is best known for a high-energy show, and the fans at the Tower were not denied anything. One of the more exciting moments of the concert was when Angelo Moore, one of the vocalists and the band's saxophone player, dove into the audience and "swam" on the crowd's hands to the back of the theater. Moore then began to sing "Ma and Pa" when he decided to "swim" back up to the stage, still singing.

Another amusing bit of theatrics came from Chris Dowd, keyboardist/vocalist/trombone player. Every time Dowd needed his trombone to jam with Fishbone's horn section, a roadie threw it to him from backstage. This high-arcing piece of long brass would fly over guitarist John Bigham's head and land in Dowd's waiting hands. When he was finished, Dowd would toss his trombone back into the wings.

Songs such as "If I Were A ... I'd," the show's closer "Bonin' In the Boneyard" and an encore of "Slick Nick, You Devil You" were the highlights of the concert.

Opening act Primus was equally impressive with its unique brand of bass-driven hard rock. From raucous tunes like "Groundhog's Day" and "Harold of the Rocks" to more mellow songs like "Fish On" and "Too Many Puppies," Primus showcased its varying style and peculiar sound.

Audience response heightened with the performance of such hits as "Jerry Was a Race Car Driver," "Tommy the Cat" and Ministry's "Thieves."

Rush rolls on

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Rush's concerts have been infamous for years on end as being an incredible spectacle as well as a mind-blowing musical montage. Its "Roll the Bones" tour fared no differently then its fierce past achievements. The dual post-weekend dates, Dec. 1 and 3, at the Spectrum proved that 1991 Rush is just as sweet as the one that erupted in the mid-70s.

With a stage complete with a 25-foot video screen that evoked its new LP, Roll the Bones, the band unveiled the two hour set with, "Force 10" leading into "Limelight" and "FreeWill." Bassist/vocalist Geddy Lee swung his new born Ramones-styled hair about as the dapper guitarist Alex Lifeson strummed with him in unison projecting some of the best sounding Rush chords in years.

New material "DreamLine," "Bravado" and the title track were as captivating as classics "Time Stand Still," "Show Don't Tell" and "Big Money." But it was drummer Neal Peart's solo that grabbed the audience by the throat. His solo is perhaps, along with Motley Crue drummer Tommy Lee's, one of the only drum solos worth hearing. The intensity that is projected during Peart's 15 minutes of sheer madness is astonishing as well as musically qualitative. The lasers, programmed to the pacing of the drum beats, took second bill to Peart's heat.

Rush proved, along with its distinguished musical ability, that they have a humorous yet intriguing symbolistic style about themselves. Whether it be through a skeleton performing the rap segment during, "Roll the Bones" or two giant inflatable bunny rabbits popping out of a hat on either sides of the stage while the trio jammed, "Tom Sawyer," Rush pulls off visuals without glittering out their performance.

The technical side of the concert made the evening the success that it was. A surrounding sound rig featuring a pair of speakers hanging across the stadium, opposite end of the stage, enabled sound effect to travel from one side of the room to another in flash while the video screen ran numerous odd film clips in fast motion.

Some of the highlighted pieces ranged from "Subdivisions" to "Xanadu" to "Closer to the Heart." But it was the encore of "The Spirit of Radio"/"The Temples of Syrinx"/"Finding My Way"/"La Villa Strangiato"/"Anthem"/Red Barchetta" that ssent the sold-out crowd into a ffrenzy.

The one flaw that Rush possesses is a lack of verbal communication with their fans. With the exception of the occasional, "Hello, Philly!" and "Goodnight, see you real soon!" Rush lacked a bit in stage presence. But, regardless, its instruments spoke and that's what its cult fans came to hear.

Creepy 'Addams Family' scares up success

By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

"The Addams Family"
Directed by Barry Sonnefeld
Paramount Pictures

Yes, the trend of multi-million dollar big-screen reruns has raised another 60's sitcom from the dead. With a star-studded cast and a $33 million production budget, "The Addams Family" may be creepy and kooky, but it's mostly hokey.

Raul Julia stars as Gomez Addams and Anjelica Huston is his pale wife Morticia in the revival of the short-lived TV show. The movie opens with the entire family scalding Christmas carolers with a boiling pot of broth. They seem content in their spacious and haunting mansion, complete with their lovable seven-foot monster/butler, Lurch.

Of course, they are different from the average American family. Children Wednesday and Pugsley delight in electrocuting each other and playing with large butcher knives. Dinner consists of intestines, insects and (for special occasions) eyes. Thing, that spirited hand without a body, dances and scampers about the house with such abandon that it nearly steals the film.

The story develops when Uncle Fester (Christopher Lloyd) returns to collect the vast family fortune, hidden in a secret chamber deep beneath the house. As he and Gomez reminisce, it soon becomes clear that Fester may not be who he claims.

The movie progresses in comical style, combining a weak plot with evidence of the family's eccentricities. While the characters are humorously ghoulish, the special effects are more interesting than the movie. The audience follows Thing as it wanders about and is entranced by headstones that litter the background of several scenes.

"The Addams Family" may spark a long line of revivals created for one purpose: money. Its predecessor, "Batman," did this exceedingly well. While pursuing the business end of cinema is not wrong, movies like "The Addams Family" push this to a ridiculous extreme. Popular fluff like this film may not have critics raving, but it will gross a scary amount at the box office.

To its credit, the film's devious interplay between Julia and Huston may put a wry smile on the viewer's face. Although Thing is let out of its box, the other Addams gem, Lurch, is largely ignored. "The Addams Family" will probably spawn a sequel, but one is more than enough.

"Beauty and the Beast"
Directed by

Walt Disney Films has created another classic with its new animated film, "Beauty and the Beast." Sticking close to the typical Disney plot, this film fulfills all the expectations that have been conceived since the award-winning "The Little Mermaid." Combining powerful voice talents such as Robby Benson (the beast), Angela Lansbury (Mrs. Potts), and Paige O'Hara (Belle), the characters soon become real and play on the audience's emotions. They gain our sympathy and affection, the ultimate goal in animation.

"Beauty and the Beast" tells the story of a beautiful, independent woman who is somewhat of an outcast in her small "provincial" town. On account of her beauty, Belle is sought after by the town casanova, Gaston. As a result of an unfortunate journey, Belle's father finds himself as a prisoner in the beast's castle. Dutifully, Belle sets out to find him and that is where the love story begins.

The film takes the viewers on an enchanted journey to a magical castle where the candelabra is your friend and an animated clock is your special guardian. It is rare to find a film in which all the stereotypes are right on target. Belle is strong-willed and mature whereas Gaston is conceited and rude.

The beast is another story. On the outside he is a tough, cruel animal who rarely shows his true inner self. However, he desperately hopes to fall in love and share the grounds of his castle. As the movie unfolds, you begin to feel more and more compassion for the oversized animal.

The musical score of the film adds strength to an already complete project. Richard White belts an unforgetable egomaniac tune entitled "Gaston" while Jerry Orbach as the candelabra joins kitchen appliances in a broadway-like chorus. Angela Lansbury also has the chance to sing the opening ballad which gets the film off to a strong start.

"Beauty and the Beast" will undoubtably be named yet another Disney classic and rightfully so. The characters are believable and realistic. The plot is basically simple and predictable. But, what pulls the movie together is the attention payed to all the details that are often overlooked. The scenery is complete and the colors are vibrant. With all of these aspects in tune, there is no chance of Disney missing the mark.

"Girl" surprises

"My Girl"
Directed by Columbia Pictures

Warning to all children: this film is not merely a sugary tale of two kids kissing for the first time. For two-thirds of "My Girl," the film shows all the earmarks of another sappy coming-of-age-story. The shocking conclusion of one child's death and the aftermath of the tragedy leaves audiences shocked, shaken and filling theaters with the sounds of sobbing.

Vada (Anne Chlumsky) is a precocious 11-year-old who lives with her father (Dan Aykroyd) in his funeral home.

Thomas J. (Macaulay Culkin) is her best friend "who is allergic to everything." Vada is outgoing, impatient and talkative, while Thomas J. quietly takes his time. They ride their bikes, climb trees and dream of what they will become. Carefree summer days are spent by the lake, fishing and talking about school, acrobats, gumdrops and heaven.

Then Vada's dad hires a makeup artist (Jamie Lee Curtis) for his business and almost immediately falls in love. Confused by her father's new interest, Vada plays tricks on the couple to keep them apart. Unaware of her puzzlement, they announce their plans for marriage.

Up to this point, the film seems to have few surprises. The foreshadowing is evident but subtle, and then Thomas' death changes the tone completely, from quaint summer scenery to death and its obvious ramifications. The quick gear shift from childlike innocence to an adult theme might have torn the film apart, but it handles the dilemma carefully. It turns out to be a lesson in how to deal with death, yet still maintaining a delicate touch.

Chlumsky is the star of this show, and she handles her role with convincing style. Culkin plays a supporting role, but nevertheless performs a tough part with skill. Aykroyd provides little of the comic humor he is famous for, and Curtis is just one step above her usual temptress character, although she still dresses like one.

"My Girl" poignantly handles its major theme, but uses children to address its mature topics. If the filmmakers used kids to cause more tears to flow, it certainly proved a point. Most audiences will need a box of tissue per viewer to handle "My Girl".

Diceman films HBO special

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

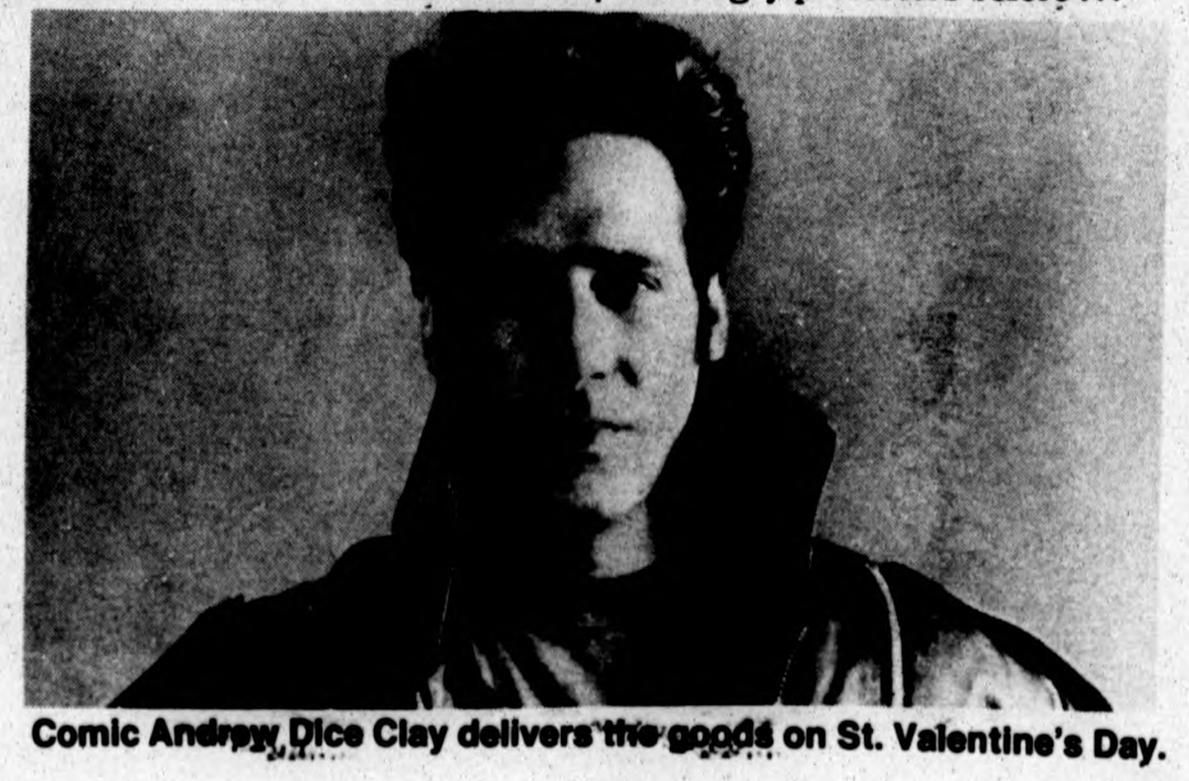
"No dice" is a phrase comedian Andrew Dice Clay has been recently accustomed to hearing. His three-picture deal with 20th Century Fox was nixed after his starring role debut, "The Adventures of Ford Fairlane," was literally a facial mudslide for Dice compliments of the harsh critics and women activists. Singer Sinead O'Connor and ex-Saturday Night Live actress Nora Dunn, both boycotted the SNL episode he hosted, hence the show was the most watched episode in SNL history. ABC dowsed his "Sal Man" TV series before it ever aired. Dice was turning into one of his own dirty nursery rhymes.

Like Rocky Balboa showed us five times, when you're down and out ... go back to where you started. Dice first began on HBO, sky-rocketing to leather-bound fame with his hour New Year's Eve special, "The Diceman Cometh" filmed at South Street's Theater of the Living Arts. The show became the most watched comedy special in HBO history.On Nov. 23 Dice came home, not so much to lick his wounds but rather start over with a new HBO special.

With a stage decked out in hearts, glitter and splashes of red, white and pink everywhere, the setting looked like Chuck Woolery's living room. However, unlike Dice's New Year's special, Valentine's Day is the target date. And with a title and theme dubbed "For Ladies Only," Dice appeared to be up to one of his chain-smoking, side-burned tricks. He was. His regular women-bashing schtick has flip-flopped to guy-bashing.

Familiar outlets such as picking apart daring couples in the front row, analyzing perverse sexual subjects and spouting out nursery rhymes all remained, but with a different twist. "So ladies ... being the sensitive guy that I am, I'm now your spokesperson. Just think of me as a chick with %#*&@," claimed Dice. Dice blasted men in the audience about typical rude male rituals that females abhor.

Despite his change of heart, Dice's vulgarity has not dissipated. He remains as filthy and as funny as ever but tends to act less goofy, steering away from wiggling his lit cigarette, screaming, "Ooooh!" after every comment and flicking his collar up and around his neck. Rather than these rituals he starts the special with a song. And he thought he had angry protestors before ...



Comic Andrew Dice Clay delivers the goods on St. Valentine's Day.

Foreigner revives old spirit at Tower

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Foreigner is lucky. Perhaps, too lucky. Its audience waited until 10:15 p.m., almost two hours between opener XYZ's set and its supposed 9:15 p.m. curtain call. Meanwhile, its bus driver got lost on Interstate 95. Regardless, with the loss of original lead singer Lou Gramm and drummer Dennis Elliott, Foreigner pulled off a firecracking performance at the Tower Theater Nov. 23.

New lead vocalist Johnny Edwards has a soulful Gramm-like voice and the look of a Venice Beach metal-head with his well-toned muscles and mop of hair. "This is the new guy," announced guitarist/keyboardist/band leader Mick Jones. "He's just a damn kid." Opening with the old jammer, "Long, Long Way From Home" Edwards won the crowd's respect and full focus from note number one.

"A serious and sincere apology to you guys for our lateness," stated Edwards, "Now let's rock." Comments of this sort cheapened Edwards' stage presence with his standard rock star comments. However, this was among the evening's few faults.

The set list blended Foreigner's new album, Unusual Heat and its greatest hits compilation, Records. The pairing of the old, "Double Vision" and new hit single, "Low Down and Dirty," meshed without flaw. The new material melted with the classics without any boring transitions.

New material such as "Mountain of Love," "Only Heaven Knows" and "Ready for the Rain" evoked a real awakening, showing evidence that some life still remains in this band despite the fact that Jones and bassist Rick Wills are the only originals remaining.

Edwards has great vocal strength and proves it as he holds his own on "Cold as Ice," "Dirty White Boy" and "Urgent." However, he lacks diversity, something Gramm had in abundance. On softer tunes, "Waiting For a Girl Like You" and "I Want to Know What Love Is," Edwards fails to project Gramm's incredible pitch.

What Edwards lacks in tone, he replaces with power. "Jukebox Hero" and "Hot Blooded" were reborn as Edwards crooned without a scratch or click in his throat. Foreigner was in a heated position for a while but Jones has Edwards to thank for saving his behind. Foreigner is not a supergroup but is solid, along the lines of Journey, ELP and Bad Company. They are of a breed that is rapidly becoming extinct in a world of rapping one-hit wonders. When analyzing their history, you cannot help thinking ELP's song, "Lucky Man," was written for Jones.

your lucky enough you'll go through it with some friends."

V: How did Little Steven's producing Better Days come about?

SOUTHSIDE: "Each year I perform a live show at the Garden States Arts Center. I wanted to make it different, better. So I called Little Steven and he was up for it. The audience went nuts. We sparked ideas and things began, again."

V: What caused your initial parting with Little Steven?

SOUTHSIDE: "Steve got this offer to play with Springsteen's E Street Band. Things were breaking big for him and a lot of people were after him. He not only needed a guitarist but a friend to give him the lowdown. Springsteen needed Steven more than I did, he needed a friend. Steven was the one."

V: At one point in your career you dropped the Asbury in your band title, how come?

SOUTHSIDE: "I got tired of it. Everywhere I went people asked me about Asbury Park, I felt as if I was part of a chamber in Congress (laughs). Therefore I didn't want to become labeled as simply a 'Jersey musician.' I got bored."

V: There appears to be an underlying theme of optimism on Better Days. Was this one of your objectives when recording it?

SOUTHSIDE: "I feel very optimistic these days. I feel that I have chosen my definite path, I am a professional musician and I will be till the day I die. And that's the greatest news in the world to me."

V: You also teamed up with Jon Bon Jovi on tracks, "I've Been Working Too Hard" and "Soul's on Fire." How did you hook up with Jon?— Your music is very different.

SOUTHSIDE: "I've known Jon for ten years. He used to come out and watch me and the Jukes play. He actually wanted to play guitar when Steven and I were touring last year. I said, 'your out of your mind, yes!' Our friendship grew strong on the road and when it came time to record he asked if he could chip in. I said suuure!"

V: Would you consider collaborating with Jon on a songwriting basis or possibly producing a record in the future?

SOUTHSIDE: "Definitely. I'd love to. He's a fantastic talent. I've even written songs with Jon, as well as Billy Falcon and Robbie Nevil. He's a busy guy. Plus he's got his own record company, Jamco. We'll have to see."

V: Your music seems to be more fitting in a club style atmosphere rather than in an arena. Do you enjoy playing in clubs or would you like to make that transition to arena-type venues?

SOUTHSIDE: "Don't tell my record company, but I'd rather play clubs. (Laughs.) Should it come to the point that we head into arenas I'll make sure a good time will be had by all. But, you can not beat the intimacy in clubs. We'll tour clubs till the end of the month then head out to the US, Europe and Japan in January and all year."

V: Do you see yourself remaining on this course that you are heading?

SOUTHSIDE: "What ever happens I can handle it. I can take anything that's thrown at me. I've been through the mill, but they should have gotten me earlier."

M. Jackson turns 'hip-pop'

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

ROCK QUARRY

When we last left Michael Jackson he was fighting off Smooth Criminals, dancing with Dirty Diana and moonwalking across the globe on his year-long world tour supporting his 25 million plus selling LP, Bad. Jackson has now, four years later, returned claiming that he no longer Bad but, rather Dangerous, the title of his screaming new album.

Jackson, now dubbed the 'King of Pop,' has already scored and turned heads with his tremendous yet simplistic No. 1 single and video, "Black or White." However, Dangerous takes on a different image then the airy single paints.

Michael Jackson is probably one of the most highly praised and brutally criticized figures of all time. Between plastic surgical operations, crotch grabs and filling his estate with exotic animals like Noah's Ark, Jackson has never let us in. He dances with the public with a safe assured double arms length away. Dangerous opens the doors to his mind, his soul and most of all his humanity.

In doing this Jackson has to play the ugly game of catch-up. Pop music has evolved through many different left turns since Jackson's penny loafers last hit the pavement. Rap hip-hop music has literally over taken all and the alternative has become pop metal. In the words of rappers 3rd Bass, "hip-hop turned into hip-pop." On Dangerous Jackson dropped longtime producer, Quincy Jones only to be replaced by new jack swing producers Teddy Riley and Bill Bottrell (Guy).

With appearances by rapper Heavy D and Guns N'Roses guitarist Slash, opening scorcher "Jam" and rocker "Give in to Me" respectively, two of the albums best moments, duets with Paul McCartney and Stevie Wonder and solos by guitarist Eddie Van Halen and Steve Stevens appear to be old hat. Numbers "She Drives Me Wild," "Who Is It" and the title track have the flash and down street bounce Jackson seeks and needs.

Real human emotions lace these slick array of jingles that donned the first half of the album. On "Trip" Jackson cries, "They say I'm different. They don't understand. But there's bigger problems. So there's no real time to trip on me," expressing his inner anger. Meanwhile, "In the Closet" displays his honest and true sexuality and lust, "I really want it. I can't deny. It's just desire. I really love it. 'Cause if its aching, you have to rub it." A little different from the three hanky fluff melodies of "Man in the Mirror." Although those appear too.

"Keep the Faith," "Heal the World" and "Gone Too Soon" are not so much love songs but "feel good" tunes that are suppose to sooth the soul instead of aching and sulking over a lost love, hence "She's Out of My Life." The rhythms are strong but appear to lose sincerity in midst of overboasted emotional syrup. However, "Will You Be There" is Jackson's best emotional expression yet as he croons the religious ballad with an unforgettable hook.

But, the question remains: will his revamped sound capture the mammoth popularity that Jackson so desires and in fact lives for? His goal is to be the biggest, the best and most of all the baddest. Perhaps his latest move might be a little bit, shall we say ... Dangerous?

U2, sadly enough, seems to be a band that once was. Simply their name suggested unity with their audience creating an atomic bond that made them so incredibly special. Achtung Baby voids all of this and makes you think that lead singer Bono is more concerned with his hair style than his audience.

The psychedelic feel and glam look that they now advertise is a bit much and perhaps pompous. From the opening number, "Zoo Station" and its metallic sampling something seems odd. Their mystical openfield sound appears to be lost in a moody funk on songs "Whose Going to Ride Your Wild Horses" and first INXS-on-acid single, "The Fly."

Baby is still musically captivating at moments such as "Mystical Ways," "Even Better Than The Real Thing", and "So Cruel" due to their irresistible grooves. But, their focus is off track and needs to be realigned and set straight. Even the cover art is flaky featuring various snap shots of the band mugging in various street parties and bars surrounded by animal close-ups. If they continue to follow this fashion they should rename the band, ME.

PEBBLES: Ozzy Osbourne has broken his foot and therefore canceled the remaining dates on his "Theater of Madness" tour. The tour so far has been a sell out, but the Ozz's recent lay-up won't shake the original batman as he'll resume Jan. 10. An arena tour will follow in the spring ... Van Halen performed a free concert this week in Dallas, Texas at the Cotton Bowl. The last time the four-some hit this area, 1988's Texxas Jam, lead singer Sammy Hagar almost lost his voice. Hagar had promised the crowd a freebie and proved he's a man of his word. This week's column is dedicated to the late great lead singer of Queen, Freddie Mercury who died on Nov. 23 from AIDS.

Furs headline at Cabaret

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

The Psychedelic Furs, who first achieved American popularity in 1986 with their Top 40 hit, "Pretty In Pink," will arrive at the Chestnut Cabaret Dec. 11. The band, whose sound unites rock and alternative influences, will be promoting its eighth album, World Outside, which was produced by Steven Street, of Smiths and Morrissey fame. Band members are heralding their newest collaboration as an honest record which is "more about relationships" than their previous work. The songs reveal a cohesive vision, although the project was not undertaken to produce a concept album, which songwriter/lead singer Richard Butler feels would have been overly contrived.

The Furs have finally gained a solid lineup after having lost and adopted various members since its formation in London in 1978. The original founders, Richard and Tim Butler and John Ashton still remain. They have been joined by Knox Chandler playing second guitar and cello, Don Yellech on drums, and keyboardist Joe McGinty. The result is a unified stage presence and a musical blend which has been called, "a dense, tantalizing wall of sound."

The Furs may have made a few changes, but it is definitely back on track, with an enthusiastic attitude and a live-oriented, fresh sound.

FLASH: Texas is a band who gets down to basics with its moody, sometimes melancholy concoction of rock and blues. This talented and visionary young band, which hails from Scotland, will play at the Cabaret Dec. 6. Their songs combine a powerful and dark edge with honest and passionate lyrics. Tim Palmer, who has worked with Tin Machine and Mighty Lemon Drops, produced Texas' first album Southside and their recently released follow-up, Mother's Heaven. Lead singer Sharleen Spiteri, guitarist Ally McErlaine, and bassist Johnny McElhone produce songs with a pitchy depth and have been praised as "an original voice amidst the din of image-conscious bands."

The critically-acclaimed jazz vocal ensemble New York Voices will perform at the Cabaret Dec. 12. The five members, Darmon Meader, Kim Nazarian, Peter Eldridge, Sara Krieger, and Caprice Fox have crossed over into pop music with their new album, Hearts of Fire. With covers of Stevie Wonder and Duke Ellington classics, the singers maintain their jazz roots.

Monday Dec. 9, 9 p.m. TV: Prism Radio: 1210 AM

Villanova will battle the Explorers in the second half of a Big Five doubleheader at the Spectrum. LaSalle features seniors Randy Woods and Jack Hurd. These two combined for 37 points per game last year. After Woods and Hurd, the Explorers lack firepower. The loss of point guard Doug Overton has hurt Speedy Morris' team. Joining Woods and Hurd in the starting lineup will be center Milko Lievurst, forward Bron Holland and guard Jeff Neubauer. 'Nova's senior class has not yet beaten LaSalle, but the streak should end this year. Look for the Cats to key on Woods and slow down the temp. Unlike last year, there will not be another 100-point game from LaSalle.

Saturday Dec. 14, 7:30 p.m. TV: NONE, Radio: 89.1 WXVU

The Wildcats draw American University in the home opener at duPont Pavilion next Saturday. American returns four starters from a 15-14 Colonial Athletic Association team. Team leader Brian Gilgeous, a six-foot-six-inch forward averaged 18.1 ppg in '90-91. Joining Gilgeous at forward will be Craig Sedmak and the post will be occupied by junior Sean Stevens. The backcourt will consist of senior Donald Grant and swingman Byron Hawkins (44 percent from three-point range.) American should be the weakest opponent that Villanova faces this year and if the Cats hold down Gilgeous, look for an easy win. This team, however, should not be overlooked.

Running Mahon

By LARRY LANZA
Staff Reporter

Wildcat junior Terrence Mahon concluded his 1991 cross-country season with a 65th place finish in the NCAA Cross Country Championships Nov. 25 in Tucson, Ariz.

Despite the disappointment at finishing outside of his projected placing, Mahon's run wrapped up one of the most successful cross country seasons for a Villanova runner in recent history.

Entering the NCAA's, Mahon had won the individual title in all five of 'Nova's meets: the Fordham and William & Mary Invitationals in September, Lehigh's Paul Short Invitational and the Big East Conference Championship in October, and the IC4A (Intercollegiate Assoc. of Amateur Athletics) Championship in November.

In the heat and high altitude of Tucson, Mahon stayed up near the front of the race through the halfway point of the 10 km (6.2 mi.) course before dropping back. Mahon completed the course in 32 minutes flat.

Irishman Sean Dollman of Western Kentucky broke away from the rest of the field just after the first mile and went on to pull away to win the individual title in 30:17.

Eighteen seconds behind Dollman, fellow countryman Niall Bruton of Arkansas joined his Razorback teammate Brian Baker to finish second and third, respectively, and led Arkansas to a successful defense of its national title. The Razorbacks were also greatly helped by a seventh place finish from Graham Hood.

In between Baker and Hood were Martin Keino of Arizona, defending champion Jonah Koech of Iowa St., whose team took second behind the Razorbacks, and Anthony Hamm of Michigan St.

Rounding out the top five in the team scoring were Wisconsin, Weber St., and host Arizona. Big East competitors Providence and Georgetown finished 12th and 18th, respectively. Penn St., which beat Villanova at the NCAA Regional Championship at the IC4A, took 10th.

Women win NCAA's

'Nova star Vicki Huber won the title in 1989.

"Sonia proved in that race that she is one of the great runners in the world," Stern said. "It's really tough to win when you are heavily favored. But she didn't complain of the constant pressure. She just went out and won."

O'Sullivan was not alone as her teammates each contributed an essential ingredient to the victory. Zajac, who led throughout most of the race, finished behind O'Sullivan in 16:34 and 13 seconds ahead of the next finisher. After winning NCAA Freshman of the Year last year, Zajac continued to make strides toward world-class status.

Nnenna Lynch, who battled the flu during the race, took 12th place in 17:03.7 while Cheri Goddard (17:24) and Carol Haux (17:56) closed out the scoring with finishes of 31st and 68th, respectively. Both Goddard and Haux battled sickness and almost collapsed with 1200 meters left, but were able to continue.

"Nnenna Lynch is Miss Consistency," Stern said. "She goes out and uses her tremendous talent to the maximum every race.

"The real scary part of the race was when Goddard was ready to go down with 1200 meters left. Luckily, I was standing right there. I just told her 'stay on your feet and we'll win.' She didn't remember finishing the race when I talked to her the next day. But I'll always remember the race she ran. She competed on pure guts."

Michelle Torelli (18:18.1, 94th) and Chris Gentile (18:26, 104th) were 'Nova's sixth and seventh runners. Despite not gaining individual honors, both ran their top races of the year.

"On any other team in the country, they could have been in the starting five," Stern said. "That is a true credit to their talent."

Despite just winning the championship, Stern is pointing to next year and the Cats' hopes with Zajac, Lynch and Goddard returning. 'Nova is a strong favorite to capture its fourth straight while Zajac will be the top returning individual performer.

"We're excited about next year," Stern said. "No one on next year's team will have experienced a loss as a collegiate. Other teams may challenge us, but we have Villanova written across our jerseys. And that means a lot to every one on the team."

Big 5 changes caused by 'Nova need for flexibility

By TOM COLLINS
Editor in Chief

In a controversial move dictated by the desire for schedule flexibility and national recruiting, Villanova requested the reduction of the Big Five Basketball round-robin schedule from four to two games annually. The City Series, which began in 1955, became a Philadelphia basketball tradition with its unparalleled excitement and classic doubleheaders at the Palestra. But due to the increasing economical pressures of college athletics, the ties between the five teams, 'Nova, Temple, LaSalle,, St. Joseph's and Penn, became strained over the past five years.

University presidents, the presiding body over Big Five regulations, agreed to reduce the series to two games for each team through the 1994-95 season with all games to be played in the Spectrum, which has a capacity of over 18,000. The decision occurred after Villanova, confronted with increased scheduling conflicts due to the 10-member Big East Conference and the NCAA's reduction of regular season contests, asked for release from the original contract.

"I think everything is different from 30 years ago," said Bob Vetrone, who has covered the Big Five basketball since its birth. "You have to remember that when the five teams first got together, the marriage was perfect. Each school was looking for an alliance to gain exposure. It was a great thing, but times change."

"We are trying to keep Villanova a high profile university," Villanova Athletic Director Ted Aceto said. "If we were to continue with the round-robin structure, we would not be able to do so. It caused great inflexibility in our schedule."

If the original format of the City Series remained intact for this season, 'Nova would not be able to meet the requirements of its conference or the NCAA, according to Aceto. With the imposition of a 27-game regular season limit and the addition of Miami to the Big East, it was logistically impossible to maintain the four city games. Besides the two city games, Temple and LaSalle, 18 games in 1991-92 are against conference competition and two more, against North Carolina and Georgia Tech, are required non-conference due to league rules. The Houston contest fulfills Head Coach Rollie Massimino's policy of playing in the senior class' hometowns (current Cat Chris Walker is a Texas native) and another three will be played at the Rainbow Classic Holiday Tournament. The only non-committal game is American University.

"[University President] Father Dobbin and the administration want Villanova to be a national Catholic university, and the athletic department is just a part of that mandate," Aceto said. "In our non-conference schedule, we play in the Atlantic coastal region [UNC] and the southwestern [Houston] parts of the nation. We have 700 alumni in the Houston area. The only way to make Villanova national is by gaining national exposure."

The exposure of the program and national recruiting has elevated since the 1985 national championship season as Villanova has become one of the more recognized names in college basketball. This season alone, the team will appear on national television five times and on regional or local television 19 times, more than any other local college.

Also, 'Nova's national recruiting efforts display the increased awareness of the school. On the 1985 team, the starting unit came from only the mid-Atlantic and northeastern sections of the country. This year's starting unit consists of players from Virginia, Texas and California. Only one player, Temple transfer Jonathan Haynes, hails from the Philadelphia area.

In contrast, the other city schools' primary recruiting base is the Delaware Valley. Over 10 local student-athletes start for the schools. The St. Joseph's roster includes only one non-area player, Bernard Blunt, who hails from New York.

As a result of this vast difference in philosophies and 'Nova's break from locally-based programs, criticism, particularly from the media and other Big Five coaches, portrayed 'Nova as unconcerned with tradition and financially greedy.

"Why does Villanova want out of the Big Five?" said LaSalle Coach Speedy Morris, who grew up in the Philadelphia area and coached in its high school leagues. "Thirty-six years of tradition should mean something to Villanova, not to mention loyalty. You do not walk away from your partners of 36 years."

But Vetrone says the decision had to be made in the best interests of Villanova, due to its goals and the nature of college athletics.

"As a fan, I'm disappointed not to see the round-robin schedule," said Vetrone, who works in the Big Five office. "It is 'Nova's right and duty to do what's in the best interest of the school. If they want to go national, this is the only natural way to do it. They needed space on their schedule for other games."

Financially, the move improves possible income, but 'Nova also runs the risk of shooting itself in the foot. It was originally thought that the decision came after a 16-14 1990-91 team barely eked its way into the NCAA tournament despite losses to LaSalle and Temple and an unimpressive one-point win over St. Joe's. If Villanova played patsies instead of difficult, heated city games, it could soften the schedule and improve its record.

Shocking to skeptics, who thought it would start competing against "Little Sisters of the Poor" annually, 'Nova picked up North Carolina and Houston, dropping Penn and St. Joseph's. The former teams are solid picks to make the NCAA's, the barometer and financial sweepstakes for programs. The latter are rebuilding and have not made the tournament since the early 80's.

"I don't listen to what the media says when it comes to University decisions," Aceto said. "Everyone has an opinion, but only we know why we made the move. The critics said we did it only for money and an easy schedule. Well, if you look at our schedule, it is ranked one of the toughest in the nation.

"I'm not saying money was not a factor. It surely was. But it wasn't the overriding factor. The team's goal is to make the NCAA's and that is the barometer for our program. The financial benefits cannot be denied, but they were only a partial factor."

Vetrone believes that the criticism of financial greed is harsh since each school's primary concern is economical.

"In today's college athletics, everything comes down to money. Each school has made decisions based on what's best for them. Villanova belongs to a glamour conference with schools like Georgetown and Syracuse. It is only natural to believe they want to be on a par with those programs," Vetrone said. "They want to be a national school and this was the next logical step."

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Women's Cross Country Team

This week's Villanovan Athlete of the Week is the entire women's cross country team. The Wildcats captured their third consecutive NCAA Championship Nov. 25 in impressive fashion. Sonia O'Sullivan and Carole Zajac finished 1-2, and Nnenna Lynch placed 12th, as all three runners earned all-American honors. 'Nova's team score of 85 was 83 points better than runner-up Arkansas (168).

Wildcats traveled to Georgia to face Georgia Tech in the much publicized ACC-Big East Challenge. At game time, the Yellow Jackets had just received a 15th rank in the A.P. poll and had given Oklahoma State a good game in the finals of the NIT.

'Nova drew first blood as Marc Dowdell scored on a lay-up to open the scoring for both teams. 'Nova slowly built a 10-4 lead, but watched it whittle away when the Wildcat shooters went cold. The only real bright spots that could affair were the performances of forwards Arron Bain and Dowdell. Dowdell had 14 points and 10 rebounds while Bain scored 13 points and grabbed 11 boards. Woodard also had a productive game, scoring 11.

The team faces LaSalle at the Spectrum Dec. 7 as the second game of a Big Five doubleheader. The Wildcats will look to turn their season around and reestablish themselves as a solid Big East team.

Volleyball earns NIVC

The volleyball team registered a fourth-place finish in the Big East Conference Tournament held at the University of Pittsburgh Nov. 23-24.

The Cats entered the tournament as the second seed, their highest position ever. 'Nova began the competition on a high note, defeating Connecticut in four games (3-15, 15-7, 15-2, 15-13).

But the Cats ran into trouble in the second round against Syracuse. The Orange, who 'Nova had defeated in a five-game thriller Oct. 19, overwhelmed the Cats in three straight games (9-15, 11-15, 4-15).

"We didn't play quite the way we wanted to," said outside hitter Pam Clifford. "I think we peaked too early in the season."

'Nova concluded the tournament by losing to Providence (7-15, 11-15, 7-15) in the third-place match. The contest marked the third time the two teams have faced each other this season. They had split their previous two meetings.

"It's kind of disappointing to end the [Big East] season on a loss," said senior co-captain Jen Neville. "But I thought we still had a good season."

The Cats have compiled a school record 31-7 overall mark. In the process, they posted a 6-1 conference record and captured their third consecutive Big Five Championship. In comparison, last year's squad finished at 21-18 with an 0-7 conference mark.

Coach David Barkley has been selected as the Big East Conference Coach of the Year in recognition for his role in the team's great improvement. In four years at Villanova, Barkley has compiled an 84-70 overall record.

Clifford and Vicky Dispenza also generated postseason laurels. The pair of juniors were named to the 1991 Big East All-Conference Team, as selected by league coaches.

Clifford leads the team in kills, kill average, and kill attempts. In addition to being a tremendous force at the net, Clifford showed versatility and good all-around skills.

Dispenza, the team's setter and co-captain, broke the school record for assists in a season with 1409 thus far, breaking the record she established last year (1379). She also leads the team in assist average, digs and dig average, and has played in every game this season. Dispenza's leadership and court presence has been a major reason for the team's outstanding success.

Becky Kulbago has also received acknowledgement for her achievements both on and off the court. The sophomore middle hitter has been named to the second team of the GTE CoSIDA District II Academic All-America team. Kulbago has a 3.55 GPA in accounting. She also leads the team in attack percentage and total blocks and is second in kills and attempts.

Villanova has been selected to compete in the National Invitational Volleyball Championships held Dec. 5-7 in Dayton, OH. This marks the first time the Wildcats have been chosen to participate in a national postseason tournament.

"We've had a lot more team unity and friendship and the will to win," said Neville of the difference from last season.

The team will attempt to build on its success next year. A strong showing in the NIVC Tournament could provde the Cats with a mark to emulate next season in their quest to reach the NCAA's.

The Villanova ice hockey team swamped the University of Pennsylvania 18-4 as Hugh Maginnis tied the school record for goals in one game with seven Nov. 21.

The Icecats constantly attacked the Quakers, averaging more than a shot per minute in the contest. 'Nova ended up scoring six goals in each of the three periods.

Goaltenders John Gallegro and Dan Quintillano put in strong performances for Villanova. Steve Flynn and Marc Guertin notched five assists while Ty Carmichael added four assists of his own. Bill Fortescue put up four points in the form of two goals and two assists.

Those who both set up goals and scored themselves include Dennis Mastriano, Bill Paliscak, Jin Ready, Ryan Stattenfield, Tony Lomanto, and Brian Ralston. In addition, George Moynihan, Dave Trimble, and John Demers together set up another five goals. Carmichael and Marc Haskell closed out the scoring at the Haverford Skatium.

The Icecats are currently on a two-game losing streak following the defeats to Fairfield University and the U.S. Military Academy. Their overall record is 3-7 and their ECAC mark is 2-4.

Maginnis leads the squad in goals with 16 and in overall points with 28. Guertin is the assists leader with 13.

In the final weeks before Christmas break, Villanova has three games. In their upcoming road contests, the Icecats travel to Nichols College today and Western New England College tomorrow. In an ECAC matchup, St. John's University comes to the Haverford Skatium Friday, Dec. 14 at 4:45 p.m.

Swimmers off to good start

By BOB TRAVISANO

The 'Nova swim team has thus far lived up to its great preseason expectations. The men's team record stands at 4-1 and the women are 2-1. The lone losses came against a powerful Penn State squad.

Penn State dominated the first three events by getting a first in each, but 'Nova broke the drought in the 50 yd freestyle with a win by Jerry O'Mara in 21.55 seconds. State got firsts for nearly every event excluding the 200 meter individual medley, won by 'Nova's Chris Des Marais, and the 200 meter butterfly won by Glenn Langhans. Another strong performance was put in by the 400 meter medley relay team of Des Marais, Ed Paradise, Scott Fraser and O'Mara, as it lost to State's team by less than a second. The final score was 157 to 84.

The women fared much better against a team ranked 16th in the nation at the time. 'Nova started it off with a victory in the 200 meter medley relay by the team of Tara Ryan, Lisa Flood, Michelle Pulaski, and Sarah Dykstra. The two teams exchanged wins in almost every race, but the Nittany Lions wound up on top with a score of 178 to 122.

The latest meet was against the University of Maryland at Baltimore County. 'Nova started out with victories in both the men's and women's 200 meter medley relays as well as the men's and women's 1650 meter free and 200 meter free. UMBC got its first event victory as Maria Martin barely beat Eileen Consadine by a mere .44 of a second. 'Nova then went on a tear winning the next 10 events, including a 226.50 to 148.85 one meter diving win by Rich Mannion. The Cats capped it off by winning eight of the last 10 events. UMBC kept it close, however, by earning a number of scattered seconds and thirds.

'Nova won in the men's division 115 to 104 and in the women's 116 to 98.

Dream Season over, Cats lose 17-16

It was not supposed to end this way.

After finishing the regular season 10-1 and capturing first place in the Yankee Conference, the best team in school history was looking to advance deep into the playoffs. But Youngstown State had different ideas.

On the strength of a 33-yard field goal by Jeff Wilkins on the last play of the game, the 9-3 Penguins ended Villanova's season by squeaking past the Cats 17-16. The victory propels Youngstown into the quarterfinal round against No. 1 seed Nevada.

"The homefield advantage and the wind made the difference," said Head Coach Andy Talley. "We had the game won and then Youngstown completed that Hail Mary pass."

The play Talley is referring to happened late in the fourth quarter with the Cats holding onto their 16-14 lead. YSU had a fourth-and-12 on 'Nova's 41-yard line when quarterback Ray Isaac lofted a desperation pass that flanker Herb Williams snared just before it hit the ground. The tipped pass gave the Penguins the ball in 'Nova's 18-yard line and set up the winning field goal two plays later.

"I feel bad for the players, especially the seniors," said Talley. "For the underclassmen it will fade away, but it never will for the seniors."

The thing that makes this loss especially tough is that the Cats should have played this game at home because of a higher ranking and a better record. But due to the expected lack of fans over Thanksgiving break, the selection committee put the Cats on the road and it proved to be the difference, according to Talley.

"Probably a touchdown," said Talley, when asked the difference in the outcome if the game had been played at Villanova. "There would have been no travel, no huge crowd, and no 30 mph winds. The conditions were perfect for a running team like Youngstown. Our offense relies on the pass and due to the winds, we could not pass and so Youngstown keyed on the run," said Talley.

The loss offset a gutsy performance by running back Pat Kennedy, who was playing in his first game since Nov. 2 at Rhode Island. The senior rushed for 110 yards on 24 carries and scored once, but it was the missed extra-point by William Hoffman after that TD in the second quarter that would haunt the Cats.

Nevertheless, the Cats went into halftime up 16-7. But for the first time all year, the defense could not hold that lead. YSU drew to within two points in the third quarter on a one-yard run and left it up to the defense and the wind to shut out the 'Nova offense.

"This was the toughest loss because of the way we lost," said Talley. "We conceivably had the game won and then we got beat on a Hail Mary pass. We had a to be in the final eight."

But the loss does not detract from a season in which the Cats were 10-1 and dominated just about every opponent.

"When I look back on this season, I will remember the way we completely dominated the Yankee Conference week after week. The UNH game was our biggest win of the season and highlighted by that fake punt. This is just a temporary setback and does not take away from the fact that we had the best record in the history of the school," said Talley.

NOTES: Coach Talley met with University of New Mexico officials last week in regards to its coaching position vacancy. New Mexico expressed the interest by phoning Talley, but the coach made it clear that his "goal is to stay at 'Nova and win the National Championship." ... The Cats lose only four senior starters from this year's team and next year's veteran squad should be pre-season No. 1 in the Yankee, according to Talley ... Junior linebacker Curtis Eller made the Kodak First Team All-America team in Division 1-AA. Eller led the team in unassisted tackles for the third straight year with 62 ... The Yankee Conference announced its all-conference teams and Villanova placed eight players on the first-team. On defense, Willie Oshodin, Eller, Kevin Long, and Barry Alvis were named. Offensively, Scott Donald, Randy Crane, Bill Lacey, and Tim Tarpey made the team.

Women even record

The women's basketball team opened the 1991-92 season by traveling to Raleigh, N.C. for the annual North Carolina State University Tournament Nov. 29 and splitting a pair of games. In the opening round, the No. 8-ranked N.C. State Wolfpack dismantled the Cats and raced away with a decisive 102-55 win. The Cats rebounded to beat Georgia Southern 84-72.

Similar to last season's 87-60 loss to N.C. State, 'Nova found itself overmatched from the opening tip-off against one of the premier teams in the country.

"It was a case of them having much superior talent and us not being ready," said Head Coach Harry Perretta.

With the graduation of two key members from last year's team, Sandy Litkenhaus and Renee Groft, the Cats must rely on newcomers to step forward and assert themselves. But it will take some time before these young players adjust and mesh with the team's veterans.

"Right now, we're an inexperienced team that starts a freshman point guard and plays three freshmen (total)" said Perretta. "We got a taste of what it's like and as you become accustomed, it makes you a better team. We learn from this game and move onto the next one."

Juniors Karen Connell and Nikki Benedix led the way for the Cats scoring 12 and 10 points, respecitvely.

In the consolation bracket, 'Nova battled Georgia Southern down to the wire before pulling away in the final five minutes to secure the victory. Coming off the blowout the previous day against the host Wolfpack, the Cats rebounded to even their record as Benedix torched the Eagles for a career-high 33 points to lead a balanced attack.

"We were able to execute like we did in the past," said Perretta. "That gave us the lead and that was the difference in the game."

One of the keys for 'Nova executing its offense was controlling the tempo of the game. From the outset, the Cats were determined to play their brand of basketball.

"We try to push the ball upcourt and run more," said Perretta. "But whenever we struggle, we just slow down the tempo and work on setting up the offense."

'Nova's half-court offense generated many scoring opportunities with its adept passing. The Cats produced 31 assists with rookie point guard Michelle Thornton and forwards Justine Chaverini, Rosemary Magarity and Mary Beth Tukis each contributing six.

In the scoring column, four Cats hit for double figures. Behind Benedix, Chaverini scored 16, Tukis 12 and Magarity notched 11 in addition to her team-high nine rebounds.

"Nikki and Justine's experience came through," said Perretta. "Their leadership really showed down the stretch."

After their season-opening road trip, 'Nova plays seven of its next eight games at home in duPont Pavilion. The Cats square off against the University of Richmond Dec. 8 before hosting Big Five rival Temple University Dec. 14.

"We have to motivate ourselves on offense," said Perretta. "We have to use our speed against other teams' strength and size. Our execution will hopefully give us good shots."

'Nova easy prey for Cougars

By CHRIS ABELES

Inconsistent. There is no other word to describe the current play of the men's basketball squad. A team that is laden with experience is struggling to find itself on the offensive side of the court.

Villanova opened its season losing its first two matches of the season to Houston and Georgia Tech by scores of 79-49 and 80-59, the worst start in 60 years. In both games, 'Nova struggled to convert its offense into points and although the Wildcat defense was solid, it could not make up for the lack of offensive production.

In the season opener against Houston, the team had one player scoring double digits, junior Lance Miller. Miller scored 18 in the losing cause and also grabbed nine rebounds, also a team-high.

Villanova's second leading scorer, Greg Woodard, managed to net only nine points shooting two for 11 from the field and one for six from behind the three-point line.

But probably the most significant statistic was senior point guard Chris Walker being held scoreless throughout the game. Walker, who averaged around nine points a game last year for 'Nova, missed on all 12 shots he attempted.

Looking to rebound from this devastating opening game, the

THE POINT AFTER

Despite loss, defense shines

By PETER MORRICE
Staff Reporter

If you made it to Villanova Stadium this fall, you might have seen a lot of memorable things. There were fantastic catches and perfect passes, towering kicks and spectacular runs. There was great coaching and great playing and much to celebrate, enough to tackle the Wildcat pride in all the fans. But did you notice the defense? While 'Nova offense lit up the scoreboard and packed the stat sheets, Wildcat defenders systematically tamed opposing offenses week after week. On this squad of many standouts, strong safety Kevin Long and defensive tackle Willie Oshodin are two of the stars that made the Wildcat defense shine.

And shine it did, holding its opponents to an average of only 12.4 points per game, compared to 'Nova's average weekly output of 34.4. In five of their 12 contests, the Wildcats topped the opposition at a touchdown or less. Impressive, but what really makes this defensive unit click?

"Aside from physical talent, we share a closeness and a common goal that made everyone give their best effort. On the field, we were 11 guys playing as one, and we all had a strong feeling of that," said Long, who was selected to the 1991 Yankee Conference All-Conference team.

"The different parts of the defense came together really well, with a lot of chemistry and mutual respect, said Oshodin, also a first-team All-Yankee pick.

Can any of the heroes of this Wildcat defense move on to the next level? According to Head Coach Andy Talley, both Oshodin and Long have a good chance of playing professional football next year.

Although both marvel at the term "pro prospect," neither has lost sight of the importance of academics. Long will graduate in May with a degree in accounting while Oshdin will complete his first year of graduate study in the field of international business.

"I'd love to play pro football, but if I don't, I still have another year of graduate school," said Oshodin, a Wildcat co-captain.

With all the games complete and all the final statistics in, Oshodin and Long can only wait and hope for a career in the NFL, as they constantly work to improve themselves physically and mentally. They can also proudly reflect on how they helped to rewrite Wildcat football history, the best in the 94-year history of the program.

"The relationships that I have with my teammates will be my best memory of Villlanova football. As a whole football team, we're very close, said Long.

"I'm sure I'll remember each game, but the memories of the camaraderie we shared will always be with me. These guys will be my friends for the rest of my life, even if I never see them," said Oshodin.

Both Oshodin and Long were quick to credit their position coaches, Lou Ferry (defensive line coach) and Dan Fidler (defensive secondary coach), for their development as players.

The University celebrated the life and work of civil rights leader Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Jan. 20. The theme of the University's daylong observance was "Empowering the Dream." The events scheduled included seminars, films, dramatic readings and student musical performances which highlighted King's achievements as well as issues confronting the black population.

Dr. Terry Nance of the communication arts department and faculty member of the Academic Policy Committee of the University Senate organized the day's events which began with a series of faculty and student conducted "Freedom Seminars." Featured in the Connelly Center were 21 "Freedom School Seminars" which examined such topics as "AIDS and the Black Community," "Martin Luther King Jr.: The Man, The Myth and The Legend," and "The 60 Percent Solution: Why Minorities Earn Less."

Senior honors/history major Anson Asbury conducted a seminar entitled "Race and the National Pastime" and junior political science major Megan O'Donnell conducted a seminar entitled "Social Justice and the Environment."

The seven-part video series entitled "The Eyes onthe Prize" was presented in the viewing rooms of Falvey Memorial Library throughout the day. "Bridge To Freedom: 1965" and "Ain't Scared of Your Jails" were two of the seven segments of the "Eyes on the Prize" series aired. A period of discussion led by faculty members followed each video presentation.

Special video presentations on mobile monitors in the Bartley and Dougherty cafeterias displayed a variety of information regarding King and the civil rights movement.

Poetry and testimonials illustrating the black struggle for civil rights and King's life were read in the Connelly Center Cinema. Dr. Reggie Young and Dr. Eli Goldblatt, both of the English department and Philadelphia poet Nzadi Keita participated in the presentation, "Readings Toward Jordan: Poetry and Testimonials on the Struggle."

A candlelight march and vigil was held at the Center for Peace and Justice. The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, faculty and student speakers discussed the significance of King and the ideals for which he stood. Members of the University Gospel Ensemble also sang during the march and vigil.

"It is important for the Villanova community to learn about the teachings and to remember the life of Dr. King. The things he taught are in accordance with our mission statement because we should be concerned with his issues. As conscious citizens of the world we must take time to consider what's been done in the past in order to figure out what's to be done in the present," said Nance.

All members of the University community were invited to attend a reaction forum to discuss the day's events in the Connelly Center. Student facilitators and the King Celebration planning staff attended the informative discussion along with other members of the University community.

Campus diversity focus of committee

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, University president, released the Summary Report of a subcommittee of the Presidential Task Force on Cultural Diversity. The campus-wide survey administered by the sub-committee was designed to "identify the attitudes, perceptions and experiences of all major groups . . . on campus regarding cultural diversity," according to the Report of Findings.

The Sub-committee on Campus Climate was established last year and is comprised of student, faculty and administrators. "Everyone on the committee was committed to the notion of cultural diversity," said communication arts professor Sheryl P. Bowen, committee co-chair.

The committee found that there is "limited diversity within the Villanova University community," according to the Report of Findings summary. The majority of the community is comprised of Caucasian, upper-middle class, Catholic members.

"My view is that Villanova is more conservative than comparable universities," said Bowen.

The committee also reported that the many differences between the majority and minority community members led to "non-acceptance and non-respect in a lot of areas," according to the Report of Findings.

The findings indicated that there was a lack of communication on campus about diversity. This lack of communication was due to the "immediate, negative reactions [that] limited discussion," according to the Report of Findings. Reaction campus-wide to more open discussion of the issues was welcomed by some, but deemed threatening by others.

This lack of communication fostered a reluctance for people to be honest in open forums. Many people stifled their own opinions because they felt that they would be accepted less on campus should their real feelings be known on the issue.

This inability to discuss diversity-related issues "limits any attempts to address and resolve the problems diversity may cause, or to seize the opportunities for growth that diversity may offer," according to the Report of Findings.

All respondents were in favor of a more tolerant campus. Some respondents wanted increased tolerance for diversity while others wanted to increase the popularity of existing standards. "Ironically, for some, having their position valued means rejecting the positions of others," according to the Report.

Many respondents felt that their was a lack of respect for their opinions, and the "encouragement of independence and empowerment of individuals was questioned by many," according to the Report.

Most of those surveyed agreed that finding solutions for this growing debate on diversity would not be an easy task, according to the Report of Findings.

"Change is inevitable," said Bowen.

Professors discuss changes in the former Soviet Union

By LARISA EPATKO
News Editor

The former Soviet Union has gone through changes since the failed coup attempt in August 1991. Professors at the University expressed their views on the people and the economy of what is now known as the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Dr. Richard E. Marshall of the political science department visited the former Soviet Union with 44 other profesors from universities around the United States. The trip, sponsored by the Citizen Ambassador Program, lasted from October to November 1991 in the cities of St. Petersburg, Tashkent, Samarkand, Moscow and Helsinki.

The professors had forums to discuss their papers on topics involving the Soviet Union. The forums often ended with political discussions, Marshall said.

One of the areas covered involved the economic state of the defunct Soviet empire. "The black market is everywhere in Russia," Marshall said, adding that street vendors wanted to sell everything from Gorbachev dolls to rubles for U.S. dollars.

When the professors arrived in the Commonwealth, the official exchange rate was 32 rubles per $1, said Marshall. "The government devalued to 47 rubles for $1 while we were there," he added.

Economic conditions in the Commonwealth are degenerating due to falling incomes, uncertain employment and rapid inflation, said Dr. Kenneth Taylor, chairman of the economics department.

The central government of the Soviet Union made many rubles, which people hoarded, and now the released prices are driven higher, said Taylor.

Russian President Boris Yeltsin presently is working on price reforms. "He took controls off formerly priced commodities and expected prices to raise 300 to 500 percent," Taylor said, adding that some commodities increased over 1,000 percent.

A re-emergence of communism in the former Soviet Union could go either way, said Taylor. The Communist Party had control over the military and asserted central authority. Taylor said he predicted riots during the spring by the "frustrated" Soviet people, which may trigger a right wing counter-revolution led by the Soviet military.

"The soviet people are used to suffering in silence . . . there is still a tremendous amount of fear of the KGB and military," Taylor said.

"A commonwealth, given the Soviet economy enmeshed in historical economic relations, is the most logical course of action. If the republics don't recognize it now, they will at some point in the future," said Taylor.

Dr. Zoia Korson of the modern language department said Americans have mixed emotions about the new Commonwealth. "A

PHOENIX, Ariz.

Arizona residents joined the nation Jan. 20 in commemorating the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. The move may have been spurred by developments which the people feel have given them a racist image.

A recent video by Public Enemy and the NFL's decision to remove the 1993 Super Bowl from Phoenix have cast a stigma upon the state. Both events caused residents to rethink their attitude toward the black minority population.

In 1987, then-governor Evan Mecham abolished the holiday for executive-branch employees. Recent attempts to restore the holiday have been squelched, leaving Arizona as the only state without some variation of a holiday in King's memory. Cities and universities statewide have held celebrations in honor of King.

In November, voters will again face the question of whether to make the third Monday in January a paid holiday for state workers in the name of King.

MOSCOW

After two weeks of travel and work, signs of strain began to show on Russian President Boris Yeltsin, when doctors ordered him to take some time off.

Yeltsin, 60, was on a tour of Russia to witness his economic reforms which included many meetings and appearances.

Yeltsin's health had been an issue in August when, one month after the coup attempt, he was forced to cancel an appearance before parliament because of a "minor, unspecified heart ailment." At that time the opposition leader, he took a 17-day vacation to recuperate.

Yeltsin's health problems are said by a spokesman not to be serious and he will need only a few days at home to rest and recover.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The next issue of Time magazine includes a poll of the current presidential candidates. President Bush outranked all of the major contenders. 46 percent of those participating declared that Bush deserved a second term, while 44 percent of those surveyed disagreed.

The survey included a one-on-one, Democrat-versus-Bush contest. The results concluded that Bill Clinton is the top candidate to face Bush. The governor received 31 percent to Bush's 47 percent.

Bush beat Nebraska Senator Kerrey 51 percent to 28 percent, Iowa Senator Harkin 50 percent to 27 percent, former California Governor Brown 53 percent to 25 percent and former Massachusetts Senator Tsongas 52 percent to 22 percent.

In the all-Democratic poll, "Not Sure" won with 24 percent, Clinton and Brown with 22 percent each; Kerrey 10 percent; Tsongas 8 percent, and Harkin 7 percent. Darkhouse candidate "Other" received 3 percent.

Bush led Republican conservative Patrick J. Buchanan, 79 percent to 12 percent, from a question given to 279 likely Republican voters.

IRAQ

One year ago, the 60-year-old independent state of Iraq seemed to be at a low point of its existence as the forces of allied troops bombarded it during the Persian Gulf War.

One year later, Iraq is facing such problems as food shortages, high crime rates, lack of medical supplies and poverty. The bombs have had an impact long after they exploded. The U.S. economic sanctions, enacted 17 months ago, are still in effect and the U.S. government says that it will remain this way until Saddam Hussein is removed from power. While the area, with its oil, is a wealthy one, these problems continue.

The uncertain political structure of the region, coupled with lack of Iraqi power on an international scale make it difficult to predict when conditions will improve.

Team Solarcat to race solar powered Wildcat II

By TANYA C. RUSYNKO
Staff Reporter

The University's solar car racing team is entering its third year with a promising future. The team is comprised of students from all colleges within the University and has developed into an extracurricular activity on campus.

Senior electrical engineering majors Todd Blakaitis, team leader, and Matthew Ruth, public relations officer, will lead the team in the 1992 American Tour De Sol held in Albany, N.Y. in mid-May.

"This time we're going to win it," said Ruth. The team placed second in the 1991 race.

The race which will run from Albany to Boston should prove challenging to the solar powered vehicles because it takes a lot of energy, said Blakaitis. Villanova's team has already proven that they can handle it with a first place victory in the hill climbing division of last year's race, he said.

The second of its type, the Wild Solarcat II is funded almost entirely through donations and grants. The Solarcat is an expensive project, but has its merits, said Blakaitis.

"We are promoting alternate fuels but also getting a lot of good experience ... we're running a small business here," he added.

The latest solar-powered car has an improved telemetry system which monitors the gauges and sends vital statistics on the car back to a control center. This new system allows the driver to concentrate on driving instead of reporting the car's gauge readings since they are now transmitted by radio waves automatically.

The Wild Solarcat II, which runs on the power it takes to operate the average hair dryer, was featured in a Sony Corporation advertisement which appeared nationally.

"It's a really sleek looking car — and a fast one," said Blakaitis. With its 3.5 foot clearance and aerodynamic design, it attracts many onlookers and "gets people thinking because it works," added Ruth.

In September, Villanova participated in the University Solar Challenge held at the Charlotte Motor Speedway in North Carolina. Villanova defeated Drexel University and tied with Virginia Polytechnic Institute, (VPI). In a run-off, Villanova beat VPI to make it into the winner's circle.

Villanova's solar vehicle also led a parade through Manhattan at New York City's ECOFEST 1991 sponsored by Sources of Energy Other Than Oil to promote alternative fuels, and appeared on "Good Morning America."

Along with their advisor, Dr. Robert D. Lynch, dean of engineering, the members of Team Solarcat agree that the project has had real value for all of those involved.

"It's really fulfilling when you're out there and people come up to you and ask about the car. They have no idea that anything like this exists and you get to fill them with the information. It's great to think that they go home and talk about it for weeks," said Lynch.

"It's a tremendous learning experience for them ... this has genuine academic value."

Lynch added that Villanova's Solarcat would not develop into a prototype for a major car manufacturer because of inadequate laboratory facilities.

"My hope is that some students will stay active in the field of solar power and make a breakthrough in the future," said Lynch.

The Wild Solarcat II is unique in that it is one senior project which can actually be put to the test and "that's the great thing about Solarcat," Lynch said.

"The real payoff will be if some of the students remain a part of [solar power research] and produce something of real power in the future," Lynch said.

New procedures put into effect for the '92 Rush

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

The Panhellenic Council changed this year's Sorority Rush policies after a review of last year's Rush proceedings by the National Panhellenic Council, the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A.'s Commission, and the Rush Chairpersons. Last year 74 unmatched women received no bids during the last round of Rush.

"The focus of this year's Rush was shifted from elaborate decorations and skits to getting to know the rushees personally," said Panhellenic Rush Chairperson Maria Breitenstein. Casual dress and straightforward conversation at the Rush parties was stressed, she added.

"Open and honest conversation was the most important factor in this year's Rush," said Rush Counselor Kim Mahan.

The Rush parties now are 45 minutes long, 15 minutes longer than last year's parties. With the added time, the rushees and sisters can become acquainted with each other on a more personal level than in years past, Breitenstein added.

"Fun Activities" scheduled during Rush included group movies and live entertainment organized by the Rush Entertainment Committee. These activities were designed to bring the rushees and sisters closer together in a relaxed atmosphere, said Breitenstein.

Rush began Jan. 9 and concluded Jan. 20. This year 506 women registered to rush. 90 of the 506 women were delcared academically ineligible to rush or decided not to rush. Of the remaining 416 women, 43 women dropped out of Rush or did not receive any invitations. At the end of bid matching, 27 women received no bids.

Associate director of Student Activities Gary H. Bonas Jr. said this year a significantly smaller number of women received no bids during the final round of Rush.

Villanova is the first university in the country to initiate these Sorority Rush changes. Villanova is being used as the experimental Rush model for the rest of the nation, said Breitenstein. If significant improvements result from this year's changes, other universities and colleges in the nation may alter their Sorority Rush policies, she added.

Fraternity hosts lecture on the Politics of Rap

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

The University's Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity sponsored a lecture entitled "The Politics of Rap: Culture, Racism, and Violence" Jan. 21. Del Jones, author of "Culture Bandits" and James Spady, co-author of "Nation Conscious Rap: The Hip Hop Vision" were the guest lecturers.

The themes discussed during the lecture included the evolution of rap music, the economic factors influencing rap music, the effects the mass media has on the marketing of rap music and rap artists and the presence of violence in rap lyrics.

"The strongest communication medium Africans have is music. Rap music is a continuation and an articulation of the pains, sorrows and joys of the black culture," Jones said. The music of any culture needs to be protected, he said.

Some black musicians portray black people as being sexually and violently uncontrollable, needing to be civilized by the white race, said Jones. In the minds of many, this justifies oppression, he said.

The emergence of "brilliant poets" such as Chuck D and KRS 1 illustrates that rap music is an articulation and a continuation of what was done previously and what is currently happening, Jones said. "The mass media controls rap music by pushing 'soft brothers,' " Jones added.

> The strongest communication medium Africans have is music. Rap music is a continuation and an articulation of the pains, sorrows and joys of the black culture.
> Del Jones, author of "Culture Bandits"

One such person, Jones said, is the popular rapper Hammer who is "just a dancer who belongs behind a legitimate rapper."

Jones said the control of the philosophies of the African people must stop.

"The hip-hop culture is extremely important to the world today," said Spady. The philosophical rules governing hip-hop is a Philadelphia phenomenon, he said.

The politics of rap is not just what is expressed lyrically, but it is also a financial entity, said Spady. "Hip-hop is a billion dollar industry," he added.

"Rap did not begin violence," Spady said. He said he is unable to identify more violence in rap than in blues or rock.

Today, integrated communication systems exist which bring visual images to music, said Spady. Mass media sources program violence within society, he said, and its effects obviously show up in rap lyrics. The fact remains that in western culture, violence sells, he added.

The lecture ended with a question and answer period and a book signing session.

Funds donated for Hunger Awareness

By ELIZABETH BARSZCZEWSKI
Assistant News Editor

Campus Ministry sponsored Villanova's annual campaign against hunger, Hunger Awareness Week, during the week of Nov. 17-22. Various fundraisers and programs held during that week raised over $10,000 to fight hunger around the world, said the Rev. Ray Jackson, O.S.A., of the Center for Peace and Justice.

The fundraisers included craft sales, a volleyball tournament and a Run for Hunger, which raised $4,000 for the cause, he said.

This was only the second biggest fundraising activity behind the program which gave students the opportunity to give up lunch for one day, Jackson said. In return, the University agreed to donate $3 for every student who participated in the fast. More than 2,000 students took part in the fast and over $6,000 was raised, he added.

The several thousand dollars raised during Hunger Awareness Week went to many different charities and programs dedicated to helping end hunger. Five hundred dollars was allocated to the program OxFam, while another $500 was donated to a program called "Farm of the Child" which is run by a former University student in Guatamala, Jackson said.

The largest portion of the money raised during the week was given to a special Mission project in Chulucanus, Peru. Ten thousand dollars was sent to Peru to help with the cost and operation of a new educational center being constructed, Jackson said. The educational center is being built for the farmers of the area with the aim of instructing and educating them about new techniques of farming, he added.

Newspapers win big ruling in crime reporting case

By College Press Service

A federal judge has cleared the way for student journalists to report about crime on campuses nationwide, a ruling described as a major legal victory for college newspapers.

U.S. District Judge Stanley Harris issued a preliminary injunction Nov. 21 against the Department of Education, saying its interpretation of the Buckley Amendment violates the First Amendment rights of student journalists.

The federal judge barred the Department of Education from withholding federal funds to schools that release campus crime reports.

The injunction means that university officials can no longer rely on the federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act, commonly called the Buckley Amendment, to deny any student access to campus crime reports.

The Buckley Amendment prohibits the release of any student educational records without prior consent of the student. It was enacted in 1974.

But the Department of Education later expanded its interpretation of that law to include the release of campus crime records, a decision that the federal judge said is wrong.

"The right to receive information and ideas is an inherent corollary of the rights of free speech and press that are explicitly guaranteed by the Constitution," Harris wrote in his opinion.

"I think this is a great victory for university communities as well as the student press," said Sam Cristy, editor of the Daily Beacon at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville, one of the students who joined the Student Press Law Center (SPLC) in the complaint.

By granting the injunction, "Judge Harris ruled that this case — making campus crime reports available to the public — was an emergency ... That sends a very strong message across the country that there is no uncertainty that campus crime records are not private records," Cristy said.

Cristy said that his main goal in joining the lawsuit was to obtain better access to information that should be public record.

"We want to have good relations [with campus police], but they've really impeded us in doing ourjobs effectively," he said.

Mark Goodman, executive director of the SPLC, said the injunction against the Department of Education was temporary, depending on what action the department decides to take. Most likely, he said, the department will allow the injunction to continue until legislation pending in Congress is passed.

"Hopefully, it will apply until Congress makes this unnecessary," Goodman said.

Two versions of bills that would change the Buckley Amendment so that campus crime records can be released are scheduled to be considered by a House-Senate conference committee.

The legislation is expected to pass soon, making the injunction moot and ending any discrepancy in interpretation of the Buckley Amendment.

Until then, Goodman reminds student journalists that they should have no problems obtaining campus crime records as a result of the injunction.

"We're telling student journalists to visit their campus police tomorrow and ask for the reports they're entitled to," Goodman says. "And if schools continue to deny those reports, we will help the student press take those schools to court."

A spokesman for the Department of Education said the department's lawyers and the Justice Department were studying the ruling to decide what action to take.

Speaking on a condition of anonymity, the spokesman said the department would continue to work with Congress to get the legislation passed.

"It's important to remember that the department and the students have the same goals," the spokesman said.

"Before this [lawsuit] happened, we had a great relationship with the campus police and legal counsel, we had access to records," said Lyn Schrotberger, editor of the Rocky Mountain Collegian at Colorado State University who fled with Cristy and the SPLC.

Lindback Award Nominations

University Press Release

Over 1,500 sophomores, juniors and seniors voted for their favorite professor in balloting for the Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching. The balloting took place during pre-registration for the spring 1992 semester. The student turnout was the largest since voting procedures were revised in the 1970s.

Students and faculty nominated the following professors:

Martin Asher, economics; James Borden, accounting; Bernard Gallagher, sociology; Ronald Hill, marketing; John Immerwahr, philosophy; Oliver Ludwig, chemistry; John McGowan, political science; Robert Nydick, management; J. Porter Tuck, psychology; and Michael Walsh, business law.

The Lindback Review Committee, a subcommittee of the Faculty Affairs Committee, will review a statement submitted by each of the finalists on their respective goals, methods and objectives, along with their examinations, syllabi and student evaluations for the last three years.

Committee members also will observe each of the 10 finalists in the classroom sometime during the Spring 1992 semester. The Committee will send its recommendation to the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., to make the final selection.

Committee members include Dr. John Doody, Dr. Charles Zech, Dr. Edward McAssey, Professor Jean Maurer and Professor June Lytel-Murphy.

The Lindback Award is funded through a grant from the Christian R. and Mary F. Lindback Foundation. Terms of the grant allow the University to select two award winners each year. The recipients each receive a cash prize of $1,000. No one can win the award more than once.

Pi Kappa Phi fraternity reinstated on campus

By MATTHEW J. BRENNAN
Senior Reporter

The University recently reinstated Pi Kappa Phi Fraternity to probationary status after the Epsilon Omicron Chapter was suspended at the University last November due to financial negligence.

Pi Kappa Phi failed to pay an outstanding debt and fulfill its reporting obligations to the Pi Kappa Phi Fraternity Administrative Office in Charlotte, N.C., in early November. The fraternity's social and pledge privileges have been temporarily suspended until all criteria for reinstatement are met.

Four representatives from the national fraternity reorganized the Epsilon Omicron Chapter in mid-December when the fraternity presented the required petition of 10 or more members for its reorganization.

The fraternity's reorganization included administering a seminar on organizational skills, supervising an election and establishing a new criteria for the chapter's future.

The following criteria must be met before Pi Kappa Phi receives active status:

* Submission of all paperwork for approval to the national office, to the fraternity's area governor and to Gary Bonas Jr., associate director of Student Activities and Greek Community advisor

* mandatory attendance at certain Greek conferences

* submission of bi-monthly progress reports to the national office, the area governor and Bonas

* sponsorship of a function for the chapter's handicapped

* increased involvement of members in other campus activities

* consistent attendance at Inter-Fraternity Council

* formation of an active committee for internal organization

In addition to the new criteria, a national traveling consultant for the national office will be visiting the Epsilon Omicron Chapter to gauge its progress according to Mike Anastasio, secretary of Pi Kappa Phi.

"We look forward to the social aspects of being part of this fraternity, but we are also concerned with future expansion, organization and community involvement," said Anastasio.

Pi Kappa Phi is participating in Spring Rush which began Jan. 23, and its social and pledge privileges are expected to be reinstated within the next few weeks if it meets the criteria, according to Bonas.

"I have confidence they will fulfill the requirements. They need to recognize the past organizational, decision-making and value problems and correct them," said Bonas. "They are on probationary status until then."

Construction nears June completion

By ANTHONY PALLADINO
Staff Reporter

Construction on the chapel and the Liberal Arts building will be completed approximately by June and both will hold grand openings during the sesquicentennial celebration next fall, said John Gallen, executive director for Facilities Management.

A committee determined what improvements were needed on the chapel. The group noted the antiquated electrical system, failing heating system, poor handicapped accessibility and the overall hazards that the structure posed, Gallen said. About 85 percent of the chapel needed restoration.

The new Liberal Arts building will be completed in mid-June, Gallen said. The building will contain offices, conference rooms, and meeting places. The two parking tiers are capable of holding more parking levels or a one-story building, he added.

Two basketball courts, two tennis courts and a softball field will be constructed on the land near the building, Gallen said.

The chapel and the Liberal Arts building have landscaping contracts which are scheduled to start in the spring, said Gallen. If construction continues on schedule, the campus should be a cleaner, less cluttered area for the sesquicentennial, he added.

Press Association formed

By College Press Service

Four student newspapers have formed the Philadelphia Collegiate Press Association to battle censorship, threatened reductions in funding and changes in editorial staffs.

"We felt as a group we could protect ourselves," said Bill Cunnane, editor of the Philadelphia Community College paper, The Vanguard, and president of the coalition of four college newspapers. Three other papers are committed, but have been unable to attend meetings.

The controversy that spurred formation was reaction to a political cartoon of Clarence Thomas published by Temple University's student newspaper, The Temple News. The cartoon, which showed Thomas exploiting racial stereotypes during congressional hearings, caused such an outcry that Temple News editor-in-chief Erin Fryer and administrative officials threatened the newspaper's funding and threatened to fire her and abolish her staff.

Holocaust advertisement sparks debate, controversy

By College Press Service

An advertisement questioning whether the Holocaust took place has appeared in four college newspapers, spurring protest rallies and a debate over free speech, the responsibility of the press and politically correct censorship.

The ad, which first appeared in The Daily Northwestern at Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill. last spring, more recently appeared in the Michigan student newspaper at Cornell University. Both Michigan State and Duke students held organized protests of the decision to run the full-page ad.

The Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust, based in California, paid almost $600 to run the ad in the Duke newspaper. It maintains that no one was "gassed" at Auschwitz, the Nazi concentration camp, and that eyewitness and photographic evidence of the attempted genocide are not valid.

"The truth appears to be, with regard to the alleged extermination of the European Jews, that there was no order, no plan, no budget, no weapon, [that is, no so-called execution gas chamber] and no victim [that is, not a single autopsed body at any camp has been shown to have been gassed]," the ad reads.

At Michigan State, the first school to run the ad this semester, the decision was made by the newspaper's business staff without input from the newsroom.

After the ad appeared, the business staff issued an apology and said the ad was a mistake, that it simply slipped through the process, according to editorial page editor Stephen Henderson.

But, Henderson says the editorial staff stands behind the right to print the ad.

"The basic premise is on my page [the editorial page], I run every letter, whether I agree with it or not, whether it offends me or not," Henderson says. "It is not my job as editor to play censor ... Regardless of whether [the ad] was a mistake, I don't think [the business staff] should be turning away ads based on their editorial content."

Henderson says he is still receiving letters about the ad, which ran in the Michigan Daily Oct. 24. He says the majority of the letters said the ad was offensive and should not have been printed. Others said it was offensive, but that the right to freedom of expression overrides that, and the newspaper acted appropriately. A small minority, Henderson says, wrote that they agreed with the content of the ad.

At Duke, the Chronicle's decision to run the ad was the result of a vote by the newspaper's board, which serves as publisher. Its members are students, both undergraduate and graduate, faculty and other university employees.

The board approved the ad by a 6-4-1 vote, after which two dissenting members quit.

W.W. Smith Charitable Trust

By University Press Release

The W.W. Smith Charitable Trust has awarded the University $130,000 for financial aid grants and $10,000 for the continued funding of the W.W. Smith Scholarship Prize Program. Since 1977, the Smith Trust has contributed a total of $905,000 to Villanova, benefitting over 500 students and making it one of the largest contributors of student scholarship aid in the University.

"As the cost of education continues to rise, organizations such as the W.W. Smith Charitable Trust offer institutions of higher learning invaluable support," said the University President Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A. "I look forward to continuing our partnership with the Smith Trust to provide a quality education for those who would otherwise be unable to attend Villanova."

The Smith financial aid grants, awarded to 60 Villanova undergraduates this year, aim to assist students whose middle-class status excludes them from other financial aid, yet who cannot otherwise afford higher education.

Two senior-year "Smith Prizes" were awarded to previous Smith scholars who demonstrated academic excellence, extracurricular activity, community service and leadership, in addition to continuing financial need. Villanova has been awarded 10 prizes since 1986.

Established by William Wikoff Smith's estate, the Smith Trust has given to Villanova for 13 consecutive years. Smith was the principal owner of the Kewanee Oil Company in Bryn Mawr until his death in 1976.

The W.W. Smith Charitable Trust is the third largest private foundation in Philadelphia and has four major areas of support in the Delaware Valley.

Diversity report

The committee hopes that the results of these analyses "indicate that such debate can be encouraged, respected, and used to make Villanova University a stronger institution," according to the Report of Findings.

"The campus can't help but recognize the need to make changes toward diversity," said Bowen. "It is so positive that the campus is really talking about these issues," she said.

The committee used a wide variety of methods in order to collect data. A Campus-Wide Survey of Attitudes, Opinions and Experiences was administered on campus in conjunction with the University's Human Organization Science (HOS) Institute and Christopher Peters, HOS Institute's project manager. The survey consisted of three parts: demographic items, scaled items and open-ended items.

The committee distributed approximately 3,650 surveys and 2,383 surveys were returned.

Focus Groups were organized in which people discussed their feelings about diversity at Villanova. These discussion groups "provided subjective interpretations of and elaboration on selected survey findings," according to the Report of Findings.

Respondents from the original survey participated in these discussion groups.

The committee also analyzed reaction to and tolerance of African American culture on campus through studying Martin Luther King Day activities. Student facilitators noted much indifference by members of the University community toward the observance of this day.

Dobbin commissioned the Presidential Task Force to study diversity within the University in October of 1990.

mighty empire has divided, and now Americans are wondering how to relate to different nationality groups," she said.

The breakup of the U.S.S.R removed the certainty of knowing who the enemy was, Korson said, adding that in the past, the focus had always been Russia.

A common misconception is that the Commonwealth is made up of small countries, said Korson. Russia is larger than the United States and is still the second largest nuclear power, she said.

Means of correcting this misconception include educating the American public through reading, traveling and exploring areas beyond Western culture, Korson said.

In 1957, Korson came from England to the United States, a country "exuding confidence and recovering from World War 11," she said, adding that the 1960s were a time of economic growth for America.

"Now the [United States] is experiencing an enormous amount of competition in world leadership," said Korson. It is possible for a country not to be first in all areas but continue to be challenging and retain a competitive edge to other nations, she said.

Korson said the United States should rethink its goals and refocus its attention in a world where all people in Germany, France, Britain and the Russian republic have access to health care, unlike the United States, an "economic frontrunner," she added.

Korson, who has relatives in Ukraine, was active with groups working toward Ukraine's independence. She said the people there must become less provincial and take advantage of new opportunities to educate themselves.

During a visit to the Soviet Union over the summer, Korson said the pilot announced Gorbachev's resignation on her flight to Moscow. Hours after her connecting flight departed from Moscow, officials closed the airport.

Where were you on MLK Day?

If you slept late Monday, if you barely made it to classes or if you walked across campus with your ears and eyes closed, you really missed a wonderful day. You lost the chance to witness a dream come alive and to hear a hopeful whisper become a voice.

A magnificent celebration of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday occurred on campus Monday. His dream found a voice in Connelly Center, Falvey and Bartley. People discussed his ideas, grappled with his message and pondered its future. If you speak to people who listened, they may tell you that King is an American hero, not merely an African-American hero. You may even be surprised to learn that the dream includes you.

We applaud those who attended an event, wore a button proudly and discussed the day openly with friends. We cheer those who came excitedly, those who came half-heartedly and those who came under duress. Your thoughts, concerns and hopes fostered a vibrant and intellectual atmosphere.

If you shy from diversity, refuse to be challenged by different ideas and hope that this "dream talk" will fade, you are mistaken. The dream empowers itself and our celebration grows each year.

King's dream is no longer whispered here. Instead, its truth is being spoken and people are beginning to carry his hopes. Within hearts and minds all over campus the spark of his message is becoming a flame. Next year, the publicity will be better, the events will be better and the voice of truth will be shouted rather than spoken.

King's dream needs to touch more hearts and minds at Villanova. Talk about him, learn about his message and challenge yourself with his example. Keep the dream alive.

War pride does not feed economy

One year ago, the United States opened war on Saddam Hussein and Iraq with the battle cry that it would liberate Kuwait and end tyranny in the Persian Gulf. In the immediate aftermath, President George Bush emerged triumphantly as an American president who not only destroyed a dangerous threat to peace but reinstilled a national confidence and pride absent since Vietnam. Many believed the victory would give Bush the confidence to set a strong domestic agenda and end the recession.

But, 12 months later, the Persian Gulf War is dismissed as a brief mirage of hope. The continuing domestic tailspin creates national uncertainty. Bush's stance has been both insensitive and lacking direction. Only recently did he admit that the economy was in a "free fall." One out of five workers went jobless at some point during 1991 and experts predict the worst is yet to come. The leadership and competence Bush displayed during the war is blatantly absent. If the problems persist, a man deemed unbeatable just a few months ago could be out of office next January.

Unless Bush suddenly focuses his attention on issues at home, the economy will continue to falter. We are swallowing a bitter pill. The pride we gained in bashing another country with million dollar weapons evaporates when we are hungry, jobless and homeless.

MLK celebration elicits joy ...

To the Editor:

I attended several programs that were organized to celebrate and commemorate the life of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Jan. 20. It was a day to raise awareness among the Villanova students and faculty on the ideals that Dr. King brought forth in his lifetime. I would like to focus on one of the events I attended, the "Readings Toward Jordan: Poetry and Testimonials On the Struggle."

The "Readings Toward Jordan" was held in the Connelly Center Cinema with about 55 students and faculty present. The program included poetry readings by Villanova English professors Reggie Young and Eli Goldblatt, Nzadi Keita, Philadelphia poet, and Michael Weaver, a professor from Rutgers-Camden.

Reggie Young began the program by reading poems that reflected the thoughts and actions of those that lived during Dr. King's time. The next reader was Nzadi Keita. She read works from her new and upcoming book Birthmarks. She described Birthmarks as being a compilation of poems based on interviews she had conducted on African-Americans who moved from the South to the North or from rural to urban cities.

In recognition of Dr. King she did a short narrative of how she saw King when she was an 11-year-old. Two other poems that she read included "Sweet Honey on the Rocks," which dealt with the civil rights movement, and "A Song For the Children."

The third reader was Eli Goldblatt. He began by saying that what Dr. King stood for should not be thought of in the past. We should apply those ideals to the present.

The last reader was Michael Weaver. He started off by stating that he and Dr. King were both Southern Baptists. He asked the audience what comes to mind when we think of the South. Some responses were: hot weather, good food and hospitality. He spoke about his religion and how people of the Baptist faith were known to be very emotional.

In conclusion, Dr. Terry Nance, one of the coordinators for the Dr. Martin Luther King Day celebration, gave an overview of what this day should mean to everyone who chose to be involved. The theme "empowering the dream" was referred to throughout the day and the purpose was to get people to empower the dream.

But Dr. Nance posed a very poignant question, "Is the dream still alive?" With the resurgence of racial tensions, homelessness, the escalation of crime and discrimination, some say that it is not. On the other hand, we have many people who realize that we have come a long way from the turbulent 1960s. Gone are the race riots that plagued that time. Gone are the "for whites only" signs. That was only the beginning. We have come a long way but we still have far to go. Yes, the dream is still alive because without it — how will we know if we have fulfilled every aspect of Dr. Martin Luther King's visions?

To the Editor:

During the candlelight march and vigil in celebration of the life of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. we were disturbed by the lack of white student attendance. In fact, the whites that composed the majority of the participants were primarily faculty and other administrators. Furthermore, it was ironic that many white students in attendance left after Fr. Dobbin addressed the audience, ignoring the other five equally important speakers and performers. One of those who departed was our Student Government President Mark O'Rourke.

Moreover, we have heard an overwhelming number of white students complain about the lack of cultural diversity on campus. We believe that these students who did not attend are hypocrites. Although it was not expected that every student should have attended, there should have been substantially greater interest and participation. Also, it was pathetic that many students went to the seminars because their teachers made attendance a homework assignment. Finally, we hope that by January 1993 criticism will have transformed this apathy and hypocrisy into awareness and action.

President addresses issues of diversity study

As we begin the new semester I am pleased to transmit to the Villanovan and to the University community, via an appropriately wide distribution, the Summary Report of the Presidential Task Force on Cultural Diversity.

This Task Force, composed of faculty, students and administrators, was formed last year to examine existing policies and procedures along with campus attitudes, perceptions and experiences relevant to racial/ethnic diversity at Villanova. The committee worked assiduously under the leadership of Dr. Miriam Vosburgh of the sociology department to develop a comprehensive campus survey to assess campus climate on issues of diversity. In addition they conducted focus groups and drew on other campus experiences to generate their findings and recommendations.

I asked the Task Force to provide its report in as succinct a form as possible to ensure the possibility of wide distribution and campus discussion. The voluminous report of the findings upon which the committee's conclusions and recommendations are based will be made available in the Reserve Room of the Falvey Library for those who wish to examine the instruments and data employed by the Task Force.

The campus-wide survey was distributed extensively to all campus constituencies and received a high 65.2 percent return rate from those who participated. The findings and recommendations, though the results of the collaborative efforts of the Task Force, are based upon significant input from the University community.

In my initial charge of the Task Force I requested that they focus on the issues of racial/ethnic diversity. Early in their deliberations they determined that to broaden their questioning to such additional issues of differences as gender, religion, socioeconomic status and political or personal ideology might bring to the surface some deeper underlying concerns. This appears to have proven true.

I prefer that the Task Force report speak for itself in the hope that it will engender serious and widespread reflection, discussion and response throughout the University community. Let me, however, address briefly an underlying issue which surfaces several times in the report.

The Task Force finds that respondents often referenced the Catholic, Augustinian character of the University as an explanation for intolerance of differences at the University and as the major reason why "the current level of diversity would be unlikely to change in the future." Some might respond that the current level of diversity is understandable due to Villanova's longstanding identity as a Catholic institution. Others in a more critical vein might attribute certain perceived types of intolerance to flaws or biases inherited from the Catholic cultures which have influenced Villanova's history. Still others might contend that for Villanova to affirm its Catholic religious and intellectual heritage a significant proportion of its community must be actively identified with that heritage. Nevertheless, in ideal and aspiration Villanova must be open to and tolerant of differences precisely because it is Catholic and Augustinian.

Catholic Christianity is not simply a phenomenon of western culture. Nor does it exist in the abstract without cultural embodiment. It views itself as called to suffuse and to have a transforming impact on every culture. In turn it comes to understand itself better through its intimate immersion in many diverse cultures. Catholicism is intrinsically multicultural in fact and aspiration, even though at times in its history the Church itself has failed sufficiently to realize this.

When I think of the Augustinian tradition, the first image which comes to mind is a community united in a bond of friendship in the open pursuit of truth. Secondly, I think of St. Augustine engaging the message of Christinianity in public dialogue with the cultural issues of his time, relishing debate and refining his own thinking in the process. To the extent that Villanova fails to be open to cultural and intellectual differences, to that extent it fails to be fully Catholic and Augustinian.

The Task Force report offers a constructive contribution to the ongoing debate on multiculturalism in the curriculm. This much publicized national debate has come alive recently at Villanova in connection with the revision of the core curriculum in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences. The Task Force recognizes the debate as unfinished and complex, yet important. I am referring the report's recommendations on this matter to the Vice President for Academic Affairs and the colleges for serious consideration in their curricular planning.

I express my sincere appreciation to the members of the Task Force, whose names appear on the report, for a task which was difficult not simply because of the labor involved. Their labor was a labor of love for the University made difficult because it was probing some basic flaws in a community which generally feels good about itself.

I will be listening carefully for what I hope will be constructive conversation emerging from this report.

In ideal and aspiration Villanova must be open to and tolerant of differences precisely because it is Catholic and Augustinian.

I will be listening carefully for what I hope will be constructive conversation emerging from this report.

What did the Persian Gulf War accomplish?

By DAVID J. FLANNERY

As history marks the one year anniversary of the Persian Gulf War, I came across an article by political columnist William Pfaff that is quite fitting for the time. The title of the article is "Splendid Little Wars," and in it Plaff writes, "The inveterate error of policymakers is to believe that what they do will really work out in the way they think... no war has ever led to quite the results the initiator wanted."

Why is this quote so fitting? As history unfolds before me, as I read about the effects and aftermath of the Gulf War, I realize that George Bush would have been wise to have read Pfaff. A year ago at this time, President Bush thought he had the most "Splendid of Little Wars" figured out: after we withdrew our troops, embittered Iraqi soldiers would march on Baghdad to settle scores with Saddam, Iraqi ethnic minorities would revolt and army general would turn and drive him from power. Indeed, Bush intentionally refrained from destroying the entire Iraqi army so enough soldiers would be left to topple the dictator and most importantly, hold the country together so Iraq would not disintegrate into another Lebanon.

> Iraq was shattered, but what difference has it made? My one year reflection on the Persian Gulf War is dismal.

Well, as the aforementioned political sooth-sayer promised, things have not turned out as our policymaker Bush had anticipated. Not even close. Many media sources report Saddam had the Iraqi political situation under control. The army rushed to the dictator's defense and has been effectively reorganized, enlisting as many as 500,000 men. The infrastructure of Iraq is being rebuilt efficiently, the ethnic rebellion has been neutralized and the United Nations team is making slow progress to assure the nuclear threat is extinquished. For Bush, the options are now limited. He is left embracing a policy he scorned before the war and the policy General Powell admits openly he had favored: giving economic sanctions a chance to work. The new White House policy concerning Saddam is much like Democrats' pre-war policy to get him out of Kuwait: use political and economic pressure to squeeze Saddam out.

Were Senator Mitchell and the Democrats right while Bush was wrong? I cannot say. But I believe that if the Persian Gulf War had been necessary and if we dare to call it successful, then it would have changed things or at least given a good shake. It is becoming clearer that the war changed very little. Iraq was shattered, but what difference has it made? None to Saudi Arabia, which is trying to re-establish the pre-war status quo. None to Israel which is intent on attracting as many Soviet Jews as possible to settle on the West Bank and Gaza. And none to the United States, except a quick rush of unfounded patriotism, 378 dead and an empty domestic agenda.

The politically motivated decision to invade was a grievous error — a folly on Bush's part. Fortunately for us the war is over. However, for victims of Saddam's army and foreign policy the suffering continues. An analysis of its effects reveals hardly a "Splendid Little War" at all as the public is led to believe. Approximately 88,500 tons of bombs were dropped during the campaign causing horrifying civilian destruction. As documented by Greenpeace in its "On Impact Report," one-third of the pre-war population of Iraq has been displaced. Between 151,000 and 183,000 Iraqi people died, while 170,000 children under the age of five will die this year from cholera and typhoid. Between 700 and 800 Kurds are dying every 20 days in refugee camps in Northern Iraq because the White House refused to interfere in the Iraqi civil war that it worked so intensely to ignite.

My one-year reflection on the Persian Gulf War is dismal. Nothing has been accomplished, and the death and suffering continues. No new world order is in sight for the Middle East. Does Bush promise to put the same leadership he displayed during the war into economic revival? With his debacle in Japan, the economy in distress and popular support falling below 46 percent, it seems Saddam Hussein will be around longer than Bush.

Fans who were quick to boo look foolish now

By THOMAS J. COLLINS

At the end of the last semester and the beginning of the basketball season, the Villanovan received numerous letters concerning the Wildcats' disappointing 0-3 start. The authors of these letters, primarily students, criticized the team's lack of intensity, overrated talent, demanding schedule and the notion that as college basketball entered the 1990s with athletic, fastbreak-oriented squads, Head Coach Rollie Massimino had not.

Certainly, such theories appeared true in the team's first eight games as it won only two against unspectacular opponents, American and Fresno St. With a 2-6 record, the worst start in over 60 years, and the always brutal Big East schedule with Georgetown, Syracuse and Connecticut, not to mention St. John's and Seton Hall, looming, one student wrote that "the Villanova faithful are in for their first 18 to 20 loss season since 1974-75."

In a year when 'Nova, with all its starters returning, was expected to leapfrog from solid and respectable to great, the Cats instead fell on their faces with early losses to less talented teams like LaSalle and Hawaii. Already stunned, the Big East powers would provide the fateful knockout blow and crush the Wildcats' dreams of regaining national recognition.

One month later, the Cats stand at a respectable 7-7, with wins over nationally ranked UConn, Georgetown, Seton Hall and tournament hopes still alive and, according to many experts, probable. Along with the string of excellent performances came the retraction of these letters by many of the so-called knowledgeable fans. Unfortunately, instead of either standing by their team or maintaining that Villanova needs to make a coaching change and recruit different athletes, these overreactive, bandwagon fans not only belittled the hard working players and coaches, but themselves. The "what have you done for me lately" attitude belies any trace of loyalty and, more importantly, principle. If one truly believes the basketball program needs to make changes in December, why should that change in January? Because of four straight wins?

The greatest irony of many, not all, of the letters received, stems from the pride both Villanova alumni and students take in the basketball program, one respected throughout the land for its integrity, class and dedication. The same people who do not want unprepared, incompetent student-athletes attending Villanova complain about the present group, which includes the Big East Scholar Athlete and other distinguished students. The same people who criticize Georgetown for regularly playing teams from unknown cities to assure victory complain about 'Nova's slate, one of the toughest in the sport. The same people who criticize Massimino for not adjusting to the increased emphasis on free-lance basketball continually reminisce that he brought Villanova pride and one of the greatest coaching performances in history when he led the Cats to a national championship over invincible Georgetown in 1985.

If 'Nova is on a losing streak, the reason is undoubtedly because the academic standards are too high, the schedule too rigorous and the coach past his prime.

But when 'Nova wins, attitudes change. When everything goes according to plan, the players are educated icons, the schedule a symbol of pride and the coach is a genius. 'Nova not only wins, but does it the right way.

Although this hypocrisy is both a part of sport and life, it nonetheless disturbs the mind. The same crowd that booed the Cats when they played St. John's Jan. 2 continually supported the Cats and disrupted UConn in a sea of frenzy just nine days later.

The Villanova basketball program has established itself as a model of class. Hopefully, fans will act in the same manner.

Coach calls the shots

To the Editor:

That Rollie Massimino's feelings about the male cheerleader's hair length generated such controversy is really upsetting. For anyone who read the Dec. 6 article in the Villanovan without pausing to think about the basis for Massimino's rationale, he may have seemed like the grinch who is stealing the cheerleader's gifts.

For a man who is fiercely committed to people, especially to his team and to his Villanova family, it was surely difficult for him to confront a student about his hair, of all things. But a for successful college basketball coach who is fiercely committed to his profession and who is very much in the public eye, it was a necessary request.

The student-cheerleader is considered a part of the basketball program and Massimino asked him to trim his hair for the same reason he asks his players to dress in suits when they travel to away games. It has nothing to do with what a Villanova student looks like or does not look like. It has to do with comfort in a tradition to which Massimino has been bound faithfully for 18 years at Villanova.

America must forge a new domestic and world policy

By ELLEN GOODMAN

The New State of the World Atlas has arrived hot off the presses ... and out of date. Pity the poor mapmakers these days. International borders are changing faster than airline fares at a travel agency. This time, something called the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has disappeared off the face of the earth.

Meanwhile in the still-United States, domestic troubles are mounting like compound interest on the national debt. The message being broadcast is that we have to concentrate on our problems at home. Pat Buchanan wants to put America first. The Democrats are counting on our inward trip as their ticket to the White House. So it seems that we have chaos abroad, and isolationism at home.

Well, frankly, I could happily follow a national route back home and shut the door behind me. The notion that we are still paying for soldiers to defend West Germany against East Germany is enough to make me sign on to the isolationist's Just-Stay-Home Plan.

But the world has this peculiar way of leaping over boundaries and into our living rooms. Things like dollars, bombs and pollution have no respect for their national origins. If you are not truly isolated, it is hard to be an isolationist.

What we need to counter the call for a national retreat is a policy toward the rest of the world that makes post-Soviet sense. We have happily sloughed off the Cold War fears. What will bring us to the world now are concerns that are as central to our national well-being as jobs and schools.

What follows is a stab at a revised, reshuffled list of priorities that can cross the border between domestic and foreign affairs. In short, an all-American tour guide to a Not-So-Foreign Policy.

Not-So-Foreign Policy Principle One: The Nukes. If there is one worry that wakes Americans up in the middle of the night besides their bills, it is the vision of 27,000 loose nuclear cannons in the disintegrating Soviet bloc. After that is the image of these post-Soviet weapons slipping into the hands of terrorists. Next is the idea of some unemployed Russian nuclear scientist looking for work in all the wrong places.

This seems to have gotten through to everyone from the Secretary of State on down to your neighbor. Any not-so-foreign policy has to be rooted in keeping track of, getting control of, and getting rid of nukes. Butter for guns anyone?

Not-So-Foreign Policy Principle Two: the Environment. Anyone who has ever bought a recycled paper towel understands that you can not be an isolationist and an environmentalist. We all share the ozone and the ocean.

America once made friends with any country that would swear it was a Soviet enemy. Now we must count our friends as friends of the Earth. Any not-so-foreign policy has to assume that we will only help those who do not harm our mutual environment. Think globally.

Not-So-Foreign Policy Principle Three: The Population Problem. What is eating away at the environment? Too many people. What is destablizing much of the world? The population explosion.

By the year 2000 over six billion people will inhabit the Earth. At the moment population concerns rank low to nonexistent on our agenda. But any revised not-so-foreign policy has to consider what crowding the world means at home.

Not-So-Foreign Policy Principle Four, Five and Six ... There are many candidates for these slots, from trade to immigration, but here are a couple of contenders:

Our national interest has a foreign interest in democracy. A troubled country can vote the bums out and the rest of us will not be called in to do the job. A stable world is also built on human rights.

The vehicle for all of our stops on this tour is, of course, also international. The United States cannot afford to be the primary source of foreign aid anymore and we do not have to be. Our new priorities need partners. If we are going to balance our interest AND our budget, we need other countries to join.

So we come full circle and it is not by circling the wagons. Do we need to focus on our domestic woes? Absolutely. But not all our worries are born and raised in the neighborhood. So we need a not-so-foreign policy that really puts America first and a not-so-domestic policy that keeps us in our place. Our place, that is, in the world.

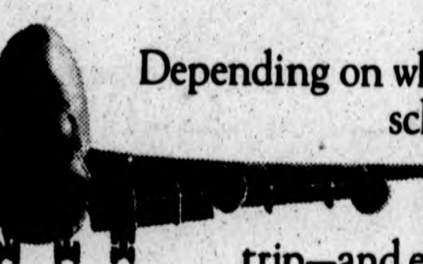
You've Just Been Cleared For Take Off.



You can get a lot more out of life when you set your sights a little higher. Which is what applying for the American Express® Card is all about. When you get the Card, it's easier to do the things you want to do. And with the student savings that come along with it, you can do even more.

Fly roundtrip on Continental for less than $100 each way.

Student Cardmembers receive four travel certificates. They can be used to fly anywhere Continental Airlines flies in the 48 contiguous United States. Two for the school year, and two for the summer.*

Depending on where you fly, each school year travel certificate is good for $129 or $189 roundtrip—and each summer travel certificate is good for $149 or $199 roundtrip.

Savings that upgrade your lifestyle.

As a student Cardmember you get more than great travel savings. You also save money on everything from clothing to long distance phone calls. All for a $55 annual fee.

Obviously, savings like these say a lot about the value of the Card. And having the Card will say a lot about you. For one thing it says you have a handle on what you spend, so you don't have to carry over a balance. It also says you're smart enough not to pay interest charges that can really add up.

So take a few minutes now to call (have your bank address and account number ready), and apply for the American Express Card.

With all that the Card offers you, not even the sky is the limit.

THE CARD.
THE AMERICAN EXPRESS® CARD.

Smith trial prompts dating tips from Palm Beach

By MARIANE MATERA
Reprinted Courtesy of Port Folio Magazine
Virginia Beach, Virginia

In case you have been considering dating again and it has been a long time since you have tried it, be aware the rules seem to have changed. I have been studying the new rules as they were presented on CNN's coverage of the William Smith rape trial.

Know your underwear. One of the major things I learned about dating in the '90s is the importance of not wearing misleading underwear. If you are going to wear what was described at the trial as "special order" underwear, it is important that your mother buy it for you. Somehow, if you get in trouble in special order underwear, it might help for your lawyer to put your mother on the stand as the one who gave you the hot stuff.

I also learned that there is such a thing as a "Go Out For Chinese Take-out" bra, according to Abbe David Lowell, CNN's legal analyst during the trial coverage. This was not the type of bra Patricia Bowman, Smith's accuser, was wearing March 30, 1991, the morning of the alleged date-rape. I have never seen a "Go Out For Chinese Take-out" bra and wish Lowell had described it and said where it is available. Since this is, I now know, the safe and proper underwear to wear on outings to bars, it would be helpful to know if L.L. Bean or the Banana Republic catalogues stock it.

Underwear, obviously, has its own agenda. You cannot say no if your underwear is saying yes. Your underwear may end up on national television, going hand to hand in a jury box, testifying against you.

Know where your underwear is. Not only is choice of underwear important, location of underwear is vital. When meeting a new man, keep tabs of where your underwear is at all times. There might be a test later.

Underwear, obviously, has its own agenda.

Smith's attorney, Roy Black, asked Patricia on the witness stand over a dozen questions concerning the location of her pantyhose during the course of the evening, and Patricia's case was seriously damaged by her inability to remember the status of her hose every minute of the night. Black's line of questioning took on a machine-gun quality that bordered on Dr. Seuss.

Were your pantyhose on in the bar?
Were your pantyhose on in the car?
Were you pantyhose on by the pool?
Were your pantyhose on as a rule?

I half expected Patricia to answer in Seussian kind:

Oh, Mr. Black, get off my back.
Why do you ask these questions?
I do not know if I wore hose.
Just what are you suggesting?
Not in the bar, not in the car,
Not by the pool, not as a rule,
I don't recall, no, not at all,
Where my hose escaped me.
All I know — I'll say this slow
Is that your client raped me!

Know what time it is. Even if you are on vacation and do not wear a watch, always know what time it is when you are meeting new people. In fact, keep a log book. Prosecutors seem to be obsessed with what time it is when things happen. Not only you, but everyone you meet needs to know what time it is, so when you are circulating, meeting new people at bars, leaving in cars, everyone should coordinate their watches. A failure to coordinate watches, or even reset clocks at the Kennedy compound, caused gaps in Smith's testimony which the prosecutor harped on continuously. Smith repeated "I didn't know what time it was," so many times, I began singing the Frank Sinatra song of the same title, only with new lyrics.

I didn't know what time it was when I met you.
Oh, what a lovely time it was, but a crime it was, too?
Oh, to be a Kennedy at Palm Beach

'Novans fight for RA positions

GRETCHEN FISHER
Assistant Features Editors

Signs on campus say "Reach out and make a difference." For those of us who live on campus, the Resident Assistants (RAs) have, in one way or another, made a difference in our lives.

Sometimes we only see our RAs as people who tell us to keep the noise down or that visiting hours are over. Although part of their job is to enforce school policy, they are also here to provide a helping hand or lend an ear to establish a community atmosphere among the residents.

To Kristin Karl, an RA in Stanford Hall, the motivating factor in her decision to become an RA was the positive experience she had with her RA during her freshman year.

"I felt it was always something I wanted to do. It is a great experience with very distinct rewards. Stanford Hall turned out to be the best experience of my life," said Karl. She enjoys being a part of the 16-member staff, explaining that although they are very different, they make a successful team.

Becoming an RA is not an easy process. Close to 200 people apply for about 50 positions. The next step is the first-round interview, which for second-time applicants takes place in a mandatory group setting. First-time applicants can choose between an individual interview with three RAs or the group setting.

The 100-125 students selected to return for a second-round interview are questioned by two of the eight members of the professional staff and one RA. The final decisions are made over Spring Break, with students being notified of the outcome upon their return. Feedback is available to all applicants, who can see Marie Schauder, the assistant director of Training and Development in the Residence Life office on the second floor of Kennedy Hall. Alternates are also chosen in the event of a vacancy.

Although the job can be trying at times, it can also be very rewarding.

According to Schauder, the decision of who becomes an RA is based on the interview, references and preferably at least a 2.5 GPA. During the interviews, applicants are asked to evaluate their personal strengths and weaknesses and to relate these to those of their own RAs. What would the applicant do differently? What new ideas could they bring to the position?

Schauder stressed the quality of self-awareness an RA must have. This quality is important in ascertaining who is best suited to the various dorm settings. For example, one RA may work better in a small, predominately freshmen dorm; while another may relate better to those living in a larger dorm which houses more upperclassmen.

RA Brendon Dolan enjoys the small size of Simpson Hall, stating that it is conducive to building a close community, which he feels is the most important function of an RA. "The main job of the RA is to bring your hall as close together as possible and create a unique community. Once you have this, everything else is secondary and will fall into place," said Dolan.

After being selected, the entire staff attends a spring training session, which will be held March 21 this year. The job itself is very inclusive; the RAs deal with everything from maintenance problems to organizing events for the hall, and are evaluated on a monthly basis throughout the year.

Although the job can be trying at times, it can also be very rewarding. The unpleasant situations that sometimes arise are balanced by the support that is both given and received among the group. This unity is, according to Schauder, one of the best parts of the job.

Japanese program succeeds

By MATTHEW J. BRENNAN
Senior Reporter

While corporate executives blame her country for U.S. economic adversity, Professor Masako Hamada smiles courteously and welcomes her students to engage in the language and customs of her native Japan.

Hamada, head of the modern language department's Japanese language curriculum, arrived here alone in 1989 to teach 29 students basic Japanese. Now, three years later, the Japanese curriculum has expanded to include literature and culture courses, with enrollment growing to an impressive 164 students, a considerable increase over three years for such an intricate language.

Students can minor in Japanese, and the department has plans for a major. Dr. Estrella Ogden, chairperson for the department of modern languages, has called the program the best in the area.

Hamada will know in March if the program will continue its expansion as she anxiously awaits news on a $10,000 grant from the Japan Foundation, a Japanese government-sponsored non-profit organization whose objective is to promote international cultural exchange and natural understanding between Japan and other countries. Hamada and Nakagawa would begin a library of Japanese literature with the grant.

Meanwhile, students have been spreading the word about the program, according to Hamada, who laughs and attributes its success mostly to rising student interest and hard work.

"I think she has a respect for students and such high expectations of them that they don't want to disappoint her," said Allan Chace, a member of the University's NROTC program and one of the Japanese program's original students who has just returned from a foreign exchange cruise on the Japanese defense ship Haruna. "She inspires an honesty in her students that I found common throughout Japan."

Chace, one of two students chosen by the U.S. Navy for the foreign exchange with the Japanese Navy, attributes his confidence with Japanese to Hamada's effective teaching methods, which include video skits and cultural exchange parties.

"The first step in cross-cultural teaching is removing the psychological barrier that hinders students," said Hamada, who insists that her students never speak English in class. "It is not a shame to make a mistake, if you don't make mistakes, don't come to class, that is my rule."

Hamada focuses intentionally on establishing a rapport with her students, and they affectionately call her Sensei, the Japanese word for professor. Students love her personality and her rule of mutual respect between teacher and student.

"She has a ton of charisma and it works on everyone," said Chace, a senior modern language major.

'Nova provides jobs

By ELIZABETH HARTNETT
Staff Reporter

At Villanova, work-study students are employed by virtually every department on campus. The University sponsors the work-study program to aid students in financial need. Through both on-campus and off-campus employment, students are able to earn money for their education.

Many students are unaware that Villanova offers such a program. It is coordinated by Mary Kay McCaughan, assistant director of the Financial Aid Office, and it is part of the financial aid department. Currently, over 400 students are involved in the program. Only those students who demonstrated a "computed need" for financial aid were chosen from the numerous applicants.

Work-study students are employed by virtually every department on campus.

Only state and local taxes are taken out of students' hourly wages. Paychecks go directly to the students, thus enabling them to use their money for purposes other than tuition.

The program tries to place students in areas of work relevant to their majors. A history major may get a position in the history department or the Augustinian Historical Institute. Off-campus employment also follows this rule. Students might work in a non-profit government agency, such as an area library.

As a result of the low economy and the resulting lack of available positions in private companies, more and more students are turning to the work-study program in lieu of off-campus employment. The University is trying to give more on-campus jobs to work-study students, phasing out those students without the essential "computed financial need."

Seventy percent of the wages paid to work-study students come from federal funding, while the University supplies the other 30 percent. In this way, the work-study program has proven to be financially advantageous for the University.

McCaughan is enthusiastic about the current growth of the work-study program at Villanova. She hopes that the students involved in work-study will take their positions seriously and treat their positions as regular jobs. McCaughan says that not only does the work-study program give the students financial aid, it gives them working experience that will be crucial after graduation.

'Novans face depressed economy with awareness

By KAREN CAMPBELL
Features Editor

For most students returning to Villanova after Winter Break, this semester seems like any other. But many seniors facing a depleted job market after graduation view the upcoming months anxiously. Most mark this final semester as their last chance to secure employment before the pressures of the real world intrude.

Though economic reports seem to forecast doom for potential job-seekers, there is still much room for optimism, said Nancy Dudak, director of the Career Planning and Placement Office. The media has accurately portrayed the current condition of job markets, but graduating students can prepare themselves with an awareness of what awaits them.

It is easy to become discouraged when faced with signs of waning employment. Statistics show that the number of companies participating in Villanova's Fall 1991 on-campus recruiting dropped 10 percent from the previous year. The number of interviews companies now offer is down 20 percent compared to last year's figures.

However, according to Dudak, these surface signs only indicate that some companies can no longer expend the funds to make on-campus visits. Companies still send listings of positions to the Career Planning and Placement Office and encourage students to submit resumes, but personal contact has decreased due to financial restrictions.

In order to provide additional sources for employment opportunities and prepare students for job searches after graduation, Dudak suggests a variety of means. The Career Planning and Placement Office has obtained kiNexus, a new computerized data base. Employers utilize kiNexus to search for qualified job candidates in a listing of participating students. The Career Planning Staff also publishes a biweekly newsletter, "Career Connections," containing listings of available positions.

Another important job-seeking practice Dudak recommends is networking. This is the practice of informing contacts of a job search in the hopes of a referral. "Often students think that a job they've attained through networking isn't a real job, or not one that they've really earned. I want to dispel these myths. These are most definitely real jobs, just not ones for which companies hire in great numbers," said Dudak.

"The job market is not completely dead, but it does require the job seeker to cover all of the bases. The current condition differs from the past because nothing is automatic anymore, there is no security of process. I feel badly because four years ago, when today's seniors entered college, things were booming. Today's freshman are better prepared for a depressed job market. The seniors were not given any warning," said Dudak.

Many students are planning to enter graduate school after graduation in view of current employment conditions. Dudak advises students to consider graduate school only if it really is part of a career plan, and not just to escape the job market. "Be aware that competition is often keener on that end," said Dudak. It is no compensation to be overqualified if you are unemployed.

Internships are yet another alternative to immediate employment after graduation. Internships offer pre-professional experience and a means to wait out the job market in a productive way. "Again, this is great if it is part of a plan," said Dudak. "But companies should not interpret this type of situation as an opportunity to demand slave labor."

Current economic conditions place the services offered by the Career Planning and Placement Office in great demand. The staff sees itself more as educators than as counselors. "Students can come here as often or as little as they like. We help them understand how to conduct a job search, how to interview, how to draw up a resume — these are things on-campus recruitment doesn't teach," said Dudak.

Most importantly, the services do not cater only to the needs of seniors. Underclassmen seeking summer employment or internships can find answers as well as information about choosing a major. Every student can use the sources provided by the office to adapt to the changes occurring in the economy.

Haynal communicates with electronic voice synthesizer

By JIM HAYNAL
Special to The Villanovan

Jim Haynal is a Villanova student who has successfully conquered more than the typical student's share of collegiate challenges. Haynal is a 40-year-old sophomore who has had cerebral palsy since birth. This affliction affects only Haynal's coordination — his mental capabilities equal and often surpass those of his fellow students.

In addition to dealing with sources of stress such as classes and exams, Haynal communicates with a Phonic Ear Vois 160. Haynal is the best user of his speech board in the United States and speaks at seminars for hearing and speech therapists. His communication aid has given him vocal output so that he is able to give speeches at varied colleges and conferences as well. He has also appeared on television news programs. His life-experiences and academic accomplishments have led him to aspire to write a book about his life. "I think the world seems a lot brighter with communication, and I have become more confident around people," said Haynal.

After Haynal first received his communication aid, he studied for his G.E.D. Upon receiving his diploma in 1983 Haynal began his college career at a community college. He majored in psychology and received high grades. According to Haynal, his instructors were surprised at his ability to keep up with the other students. They were even more surprised when Haynal was cited for academic achievement on the Dean's List. Soon the counselors felt that Haynal's highly sophisticated communication aid would enable him to conquer college at the university level.

Haynal entered Villanova University in the Fall of 1989. "Within a week I made plenty of friends. They came up to me because they were interested in seeing my communication device. I then began to tell them about myself. I also explained my machine and within a few moments I had a small audience at my feet. The women were especially helpful to me," said Haynal.

Classes present some special challenges for Haynal, but none he cannot handle. He uses his recorder to tape class lectures and asks other students to share their notes. He retains much more because he reads the notes over and over. Before a test, Haynal asks the same students for help with the material. Most students are willing to help him with the writing during the test time. Most instructors give Haynal limited time extensions for his term papers. When instructors call on him for an answer, they wait until Haynal programs the answer into his communication device.

After Haynal graduates from Villanova he would like to teach non-speaking children how to use communication devices. "I understand the frustrations and mental anguish caused by the inability to converse with others," said Haynal.

"I want to spend more time with non-speaking children because their mental outlook can become despondent if they are not communicating. When a young child has a communication device he or she can keep abreast with the rest of the children. They can have a fulfilling life such as I have known through communication," said Haynal.

Haynal has gained many close friends at Villanova through communication. "Most of my friends are like my sisters and brothers," said Haynal. "I can call them and talk to them about anything. They give their support to me and most importantly, their love. That means a great deal to me. I give thanks to them for their friendship."

with a woman without hose on my beach!
I didn't know what time it was when you offered me a ride, but we all know getting women to take us home is a way to get inside

Which brings us to the next rule.

Know whose territory is whose as there are territorial rules for sex. Smith interpreted the fact that Patricia stood close to him at the bar — "she was in my space" — danced with him, kissed him and offered him a ride home was a clear signal that he was, as he said on the stand, "being picked up." Prosecutor Moira Leach said saying "there goes my ride" is how men get you "on their territory." It is your fault they are stranded and now you have to take them home. And once you are on their territory, whatever happens is consensual sex. Smith agreed Patricia was giving the go signal when she entered his territory. Watch out for those territories.

Define a wonderful time for your locality. Smith testified that Patricia told him as she was leaving, "You raped me. I called the police. I had a wonderful time. You're a nice guy. What's your phone number?" in that order. Maybe this is what is considered a wonderful time in Palm Beach. Find out what is considered a wonderful time in your dating locality.

Get the name right. Dating today is apparently a lot like journalism. The most important thing is to get the name right. Women can change their mind, sometimes right in the middle of sex, if you call them Cathy, which Smith said he did, causing Patricia to go ballistic, changing from an agressive sex-hungry female to an accusing crazy woman yelling rape. Smith said he felt used because Patricia kept calling him Michael, even after he showed her his ID. Perhaps sex goes better if you know each other's name first.

Have an Uncle Teddy. Patrick Kennedy also brought a girl home from Au Bar that fateful night but did not seem to get as far as his cousin Willie because his dad, Teddy Kennedy, kept appearing like Marley's ghost. Patrick testified he had Michelle Cassone in his room when Ted walked in without knocking to say good night and when the couple retreated to the beach for privacy, once again Teddy appeared like an apparition, putting a damper on their ardor. Consequently, Patrick did not end up in court except as a witness. Makes you want to rethink celibacy, doesn't it?

In the Dec. 6 issue of the Villanovan, Barbara E. Wall, O.P., director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education, was quoted in the article, "Multiculturalism debate rages among Villanovans," as saying, "As a Roman Catholic, I would just like to say that, in terms of the issues that I've heard in these ads, I am very concerned that the smoke-screen of God is being used to cover up hatred, bigotry and prejudice and I find that blasphemous."

The Villanovan quoted Wall correctly but later implied that she called the College Republicans racist. Wall wishes it to be known that she did not refer to the group as racist.

Her charisma works so much that a video company hired by the University to film a peer video has asked to return and shoot more interaction between Hamada and her pupils. But Hamada attributes her success to her own education experience in Japan.

"I was not a top student and did not like the study of English; it was required. But, I had a teacher who always told me 'you can do it,' " said Hamada. "We are in the same boat, still I am learning the English. Japanese is easier than English. I try to remove the myths and stereotypes about Japanese and my students help me with my English."

By requiring her students to create videos depicting traditional Japanese social situations, her students experience authentic verbal and non-verbal communication.

"The video skits provide a chance to encounter the language and customs, for example bowing and eye contact," said Hamada, who divides the students into groups for the projects.

Participating in the videos and the cultural parties also establishes friendships, according to Hamada. Surprisingly, she recently received an invitation to the wedding of two former students.

Cultural exchange parties are also arranged with Japanese students from the University of Pennsylvania and St. Joseph University's English as a Second Language program. The students have lunch or dinner and as a group practice their respective languages.

"We are having our own party tonight with students we met at one of the original parties," said Patrick McHugh, who majors in political science and plans to use Japanese in international business. "We have pizza and practice our language by speaking Japanese and English to each other, then we correct each other's mistakes."

In any event, the growing interest in Japanese remains a harbinger to the more localized global community signified by President Bush's recent economic summit.

"We are living in the international community as citizens of the world and in order to prepare students for living and managing global diversity we must understand each other's way of thinking, society, culture and especially language," said Hamada, originally from Tokyo. "We are living a very important decade in history on this earth, so we have to think, plan and take actions carefully in order to survive together in the global society."

Cinderella's Keifer looks ahead

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Tom Keifer of Cinderella spoke to David J. Criblez in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Metal, metal, heavy metal. It seems to be growing like a fungus on the music world. Bands such as Skid Row, Van Halen and Metallica, this past year, debut at the top of the Billboard charts with the release of their new LPs. Tom Keifer, lead singer of Cinderella, is amazed, "When those albums soared the way they did I was in shock. It was like a big hard-core rush. Now it's Nirvana."

Keifer and his band put out their own effort, Heartbreak Station, which fared well critically but sales weren't as rosy as their hirsute peers. Heartbreak was a well formulated album — most likely our best work. Songs like 'Dead Man's Road' and 'Sick for the Cure' came from our hearts, not our crotches like most bands," stated Keifer.

His bitterness is evident but easily disguised by his amicable personality. Even his looks over come the scratch-back throatiness for which he is famous. When asked how his voice retains its texture Keifer claims, "It really doesn't bother me too much unless I overwork it. I rarely get sore throats."

Keifer attributes a large part of Heartbreak's short life to his record company, Polygram. "They weren't supportive at all. We only released two singles and they were like (mocking an executive in a deep voice), 'Well boys it was a bad year, whatta ya say we pack it in.' I thought there was still life in it, at least two or three more singles. But, I hate playing musical politics," declares Keifer.

Back in 1986 when Cindy (named after a porno flick) first hit the racks, Keifer says there was a lot more guidance for the band. "The people that were there when we began (at Polygram) are no longer there. Therefore a lot of guidance was lost. I don't mean songwriting/performing wise, we handle that ourselves, but rather the publicity aspect. You need people outside the band to give you their honest opinion in order to get a different perspective."

At first Cindy was lumped in a heap of mid-eighties metal filled with bands-of-the-same only to be differentiated by their hair-dye. Their first disc, Night Songs, although popular, was standard mainstream. They needed an edge. By their second release, Long Cold Winter, they had a twist forcing a fusion between blues and metal. Songs such as "Coming Home," "Bad Seamstress Blues," and "Don't Know What You Got (Till It's Gone)" established their East Coast grungy sound.

Heartbreak solidified their essence with dusty overtones of the west. With three albums under their leather jackets, Keifer looks toward the fourth, "We are currently writing now. But, the way things are going it seems that this next record will be more basic sounding like Cold Winter. We plan to record in the spring and have it out in the fall."

Cindy was turning heads and showing up the competition on this summer's lackluster tour-circuit-from-hell with many rockers screaming out to half-filled arenas. Sandwiched on a triple bill between new-comers Extreme and balding-metal clown David Lee Roth, Keifer & Co. faired well. "Our live response was fantastic. Even our reviews were favorable. But, Roth's set was disappointing therefore a lot of people felt cheated. In fact many people would leave after our set. Cause, how much can ya take?" said Keifer.

Roth's ego is bigger than both his career and his popularity combined. However, Keifer seemed to have no qualms, "Dave is real nice. He's in his own world, man. Although he was a lot different on this tour then in '86 (Cindy opened for Roth's first solo tour). Back then he didn't even want to know us. I think I said two words to the guy the whole tour, 'hello' and 'goodbye.' Things are different now. He's humbled."

However, Roth was not the only big egoed rock personality Cindy dealt with. Jon Bon Jovi, lead singer/leader of Bon Jovi, was said to have, "discovered" them. Keifer explains, "Jon is a friend. He basically told Polygram to check us out. He had nothing to do with

MTV avoids mainstream

By MAURA RURAK
Editorial Assistant

Never Mind The Mainstream, the best of MTV's weekly show "120 Minutes," is the first of two volumes dedicated to the expression of alternative music. The compilation spans the evolution of new music throughout the past ten years including the Red Hot Chili Peppers, Julian Cope, They Might Be Giants and Sonic Youth.

The goal of the CD is to bring together old favorites like Modern English's "I Melt With You" and Sinead O'Connor's "Mandinka" with more recent releases such as "Eye Of Fatima" by Camper Van Beethoven and World Party's "Put The Message In The Box." The producers believe that it is important to remind the listeners how necessary alternative music is to living a full life. "Art is a portrayal of life's experiences and extremes, and alternative music is recreating that spirit while the mainstream churns out the same old inanities."

It is obvious that the singles in this collection were favorites of MTV not only for their excellent sound quality, but also for the groups' ability to make eye-catching, spectacular videos. An interesting addition to the inside cover is a short insert devoted to each band's beginning and its involvement with alternative music.

Although it is all included in the same genre entitled "alternative music," the true sounds of the songs are quite specific and unique. No two songs sound alike, which was quite clearly a goal of the compilation staff. "Under The Milky Way" by The Church is a smooth soothing track whereas the Chile Peppers' "Higher Ground" has a fast, funky and throbbing beat.

Never Mind The Mainstream is the ideal CD for the casual new music listener because it gives a thorough sampling of what new music is all about. It is also convenient to have a mix of alternative music all on one CD, just like the Sire Records' Music Sampler. The tunes on the CD just happen to be ones that are often played on "120 Minutes" and are a part of the MTV Buzz Clip collection.

The first volume of Never Mind The Mainstream will undoubtedly be followed by a number of similar collections dedicated to the spread of alternative music and the spiritual beliefs that serve as its inspiration. With the help of MTV's 120 Minutes, new alternative music will always be made available to the masses.

Mellencamp grows up

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

With the years kicking in and severity overcoming him, John Mellencamp has reached international appeal and a solid position in the rock-n-roll circuit while still maintaining his smalltown humbleness. This is maintained despite changing his name multiple times. His Jan. 15 show at the Spectrum proved to be honest with a down home feel.

Decked out in a circus theme, with Christmas-like lights creating a tent effect over the audience and flooding the floor with pre-show clowns, Mellencamp's no opening act/no tour sponsor approach worked.

With the opening drum beats of his latest single, "Love and Happiness," the jamboree began a two-set inferno of past hits, and debuting of new material from Whenever We Wanted.

The material covered was wide and vast. He drew from his past six efforts, including American Fool, Uh-Huh, Scarecrow, The Lonesome Jubilee, Big Daddy and Whenever We Wanted out of his eleven LP catalog.

Old ditties like "Paper in Fire," "Lonely 'Ol Night," "Rumbleseat" and "Jack and Diane" were adhered to. Interestingly enough, his newer material such as "Now More Than Ever" and hit single "Get a Leg Up" were received with open arms.

An acoustic jam was played during the close of the first set featuring "Big Daddy of Them All" and the realistic drama of "Jackie Brown."

His words were few and he only spoke when he thought necessary. Although he might appear to be preachy, he spoke at length on only two subjects. Previewing "Rain on the Scarecrow," Mellencamp did a monologue promoting Farm Aid V, "I realize you're saying, 'John, I can hardly pay my own bills!' I realize that but these farmers are a large part of America. Sometimes the guys running this system forget about the ones in it."

His "Pop Singer" performance brought on another statement: "This song is not about me but about the selling out of rock-n-roll. A song that was a large part of my youth ("Revolution" by the Beatles) is now a tennis shoe commercial. That cheapens it. Rock-n-roll is supposed to belong to us guys, not Madison Avenue."

Set number two ranked evenly with the first but, as Stevie Nicks would say, it "Rocked a Little." With the sweet drum beats of Kenny Aronoff, the riffs of Mike Wanchic, the throb of Toby Myers and the extraordinary fiddling of Lisa Germano, the harmony created a slight country feel that was laced within Mellencamp's music.

David Grissom, who replaces long time guitarist/childhood friend Larry Crane, could only manage a flat sound. Crane is often missed especially on tunes "Play Guitar," "Hurt So Good" and "Authority Song."

With the close of "Pink Houses" and encores of "Again Tonight" and "Cherry Bomb," Mellencamp reproved himself as an artist whose fast, sleek and cunning, much like . . . a cougar.

SET ONE LIST: "Love and Happiness," "Paper in Fire," "Jack and Diane," "Lonely 'Ol Night," "Check It Out," "Rain on the Scarecrow," "Martha Say," "Real Life," "Get a Leg Up," "Rumbleseat," "Big Daddy of Them All," "Jackie Brown."

SET TWO LIST: "Smalltown," "Minutes to Memories," "Pop Singer," "Crumblin' Down," "R.O.C.K. in the U.S.A.," "Play Guitar," "Hurt So Good," "Now More Than Ever," "Authority Song," "Pink Houses."

ENCORES: "Again Tonight," "Cherry Bomb."

Jagger upstages Estevez in "Freejack"

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Estevez travels through time as a "Freejack."

This movie needs Arnold. Arnold Schwartzenegger that is. Unfortunately Arnie was not available, therefore in his place comes . . . Emilio Estevez?

Chasing after him is none other than Rolling Stone lead singer Mick Jagger, who looks as if he is trick or treating in a Klingon costume. Throw in a few tanks leftover from the "A-Team" and a lack-luster TV screen cameo by Anthony Hopkins ("The Silence of the Lambs"), and "Freejack" is born.

Billed "From the producer of 'Alien' and 'Total Recall,' " "Freejack" lives up to neither. Alex Furlong (Estevez) is a champion race car driver who is about to hit the tracks while his sweetheart Julie (Rene Russo) awaits on the sidelines for his victory. Meanwhile, 18 years in the future, evil Trumpian McCandless (Hopkins) is awaiting to snatch Furlong's body in order to make it his own, mere seconds before his preordained fatal car crash. Hired to obtain the body is the stone cold bounty hunter Vacendak (Jagger), who is equivalent to a big lipped Boba Fett ("Star Wars").

McCandless' neatly packed plan alters when Furlong's body gets snatched into the future, but he readily escapes Vacendak's chambers and is then unleashed in New York 2009 as a "freejack." It is here where the movie borrows heavily from "Back to the Future Part II." Little Emilio looks helpless and searches around the grim and dark futuristic New York like a lost puppy packing heat; similar to Marty McFly stumbling about 'Biff World' looking for Doc Brown.

Estevez simply does not possess the characteristics of an action figure. He is short, chunky and baby-faced, plus his "brat pack" attitude has not ceased. Jagger, on the other hand, is refreshing but his best scenes involve mocking his own self image. Hopkins has less dialogue than Sly Stallone did in all the "Rambo" movies while Russo just walks across the screen looking sexy and voluptuous. Perhaps the best performance in the movie, along with Jagger's, is a cameo from rocker David Johanson (a.k.a. Buster Poindexter, The New York Dolls and "Let It Ride") as Furlong's sleazy manager, Carl.

The movie's plot has wide potential but simply stated, Estevez is not the man. Had Arnold been the freejack and Hopkins the bounty hunter, "Freejack" might have lived up to its billing.

G 'N R lets loose on Philly

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Who else but Guns N'Roses lead singer, W. Axl Rose, could hit the stage at 11:30 p.m., after making the leather fisted audience of adolescents wait three hours after openers, Soundgarden, left the stage, wearing nothing but a fire engine red blazer, a shredded kilt and combat boots and get a standing, make that screaming ovation? The bearded Rose and the Gunners took Philadelphia for a three-hour ride through the tunnel of rock-n-roll Dec. 16 and 17 at the spectrum.

Without a pause Rose lapped the stage 10 times over and consistently changed clothing as G'NR opened with two double barrel shots of Appetite and Illusion. Kicking off with "It's So Easy" and "Mr. Brownstone" they then led into "You Could Be Mine" and "Live and Let Die."

Former G'NR guitarist Izzy Stradlin was replaced by Kill For Thrills guitarist, Gilby Clarke, who seemed to fit in the Guns' unit without any complaints or riots for that matter. Lead guitarist Slash, however, was the musical facet to affix upon. His solos, especially his rendition of the "Godfather Theme," were untouchable. Rose was still the real spectacle.

"Usually by this time in the set I'm p___ed off about something," shouted Rose as he dragged his microphone stand, like Linus drags his blanket, to center stage. Rose began to philosophize by spouting the evening's sermon with a serpent tongue.

After a long pause Rose began to bitch about education, corporate America and basically life in general: "People try hard to push you where they want you. F___k that! You gotta fight from inside and don't do anything you don't wanna. Just because half the world has no b___s doesn't mean you shouldn't.

His rap was followed by "Bad Obsession," Metallica-heavy, "Double Talkin' Jive" and a cover of the Misfits' "Attitude" (sung by bassist Duff McKagan). Attitude is the theme of a Guns concert; without it, it is not as much fun. Attitude is a sense of strength and something Rose walls himself up with.

Wrapped in a jacket meshing the U.S./Soviet/Rebel flags, Rose and the Gunners performed the G'NR epic, "Civil War." This was followed by a sweet soulful medley of the Rolling Stones' "Wild Horses"/"Patience;" the latter being something Rose could use more of.

At one point, a female fan attempted to climb upon the stage to get closer to her idol. Rose spat, "You're such a sweet selfish little girl taking time away from the show that these nice people paid good money to see. That's a good way to get hurt." Another tried and made it. Reaching to hug Rose in triumph he dismissed her snapping, "Goodbye, honey" and tossed her to three tremendous body guards.

"Do you know where you are? You're in the jungle Philly!," howls Rose as the band launches into a string of splintering hits: "Sweet Child O'Mine," "Rocket Queen," "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" and encores "Estranged" and "Paradise City."

What makes G'NR so intriguing, in addition to their fierce musical attack, but the fact that Rose's schtick is no act. He is actually a cannonball of hate donned with silky long Killians red hair. His venomized words mixed with Slash's shred 'em up guitar are the perfect mix for lethal rock-n-roll for those who can hack it.

SET LIST: "It's So Easy," "Mr. Brownstone," "You Could Be Mine," "Live and Let Die," "Attitude," "Bad Obsession," "Double Talkin' Jive," "Civil War," "Wild Horses/Patience," "Nightrain," "Don't Cry," "Move to the City," "November Rain," "Welcome to the Jungle," "Sweet Child O'Mine," "Rocket Queen" and "Knockin' On Heaven's Door."

Hooters return this weekend

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

After achieving international success and headlining large venue tours, many bands neglect the intimate club performances which gave them popularity. Fortunately, the Hooters have not overlooked the importance of the small audience atmosphere in refining their musical skills. The Hooters' appearances at the Chestnut Cabaret Jan. 24 and 25 will provide a true test of these skills while remaining faithful to their Philadelphia roots.

The Hooters' first album on the Columbia label, Nervous Night, gave them their first string of songs on the pop charts. This album, which established their reputation for unique folk rock, generated the band's most well-known songs, "Where Do the Children Go," "Day by Day," and their hit "And We Danced." Following the release of Nervous Night the Hooters gained extensive touring experience as an opening act for Don Henley, Squeeze, Loverboy and The Outfield.

During the recording of their second album, One Way Home, the Hooters hit the road again joining Bryan Adams on his 1987 summer tour. These tours laid the strong live foundation which has helped the band develop its style by moving away from the slightly over-synthesized character of its earlier recordings.

This stylistic maturity is apparent in the Hooters' 1989 album, Zig Zag. The newer material reflects the band's live experience and utilizes diverse instruments such as an accordian, acoustic and electric mandolins, a harmonica, a blues harp, various saxophones and, their signature tool, the Hohner Hooter.

With Zig Zag, the Hooters have fallen somewhat into the trap of other artists in trying to cover as many topical issues as possible. Songs like "Brother Don't You Walk Away," which deals with homelessness, are lyrical counterparts to the newspapers, but they still achieve a higher quality of music which is acoustical in nature. Songs such as "Mr. Big Baboon," which features a duel between an accordian and a guitar, set the standard for a potentially excellent live set.

These songs will showcase the musicianship of the Hooters in a live performance by allowing them to use a wide range of instruments and their local hometown popularity will add to audience enthusiasm.

FLASH: As a testing ground for new talent, the Cabaret does not disappoint this month with performances by Scatterbrain Jan. 28 and Hyperactive Jan. 24. Scatterbrain uses a bizarre blend of influences to create music which can not be categorized. The band does explosive covers of such diverse songs as Cheech and Chong's "Earache My Eye" and an electric guitar version of Mozart's "Sonata No. 3."

Hyperactive is comprised of four New Jersey shore lifeguards who play alternative thrash rock. Their shows are notorious for forced audience participation in slam dancing and stage diving, so their performances should be interesting.

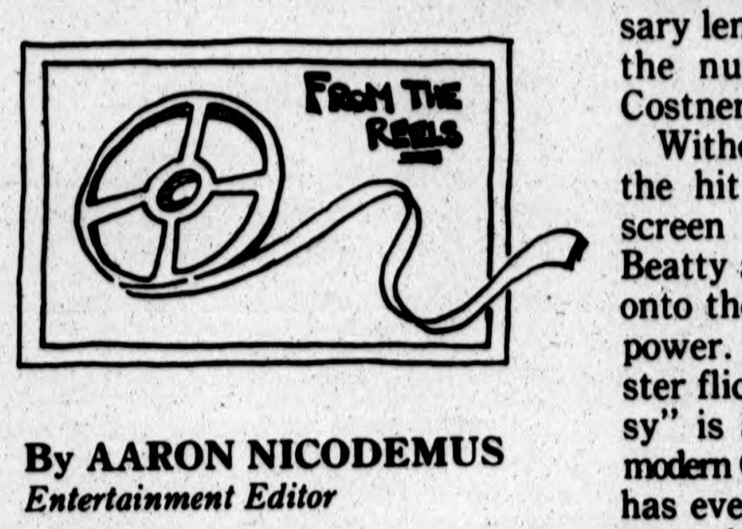
Holidays give mixed bag



By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

With the Christmas movie season comfortably behind us, its aftertaste lingers on and on. While Americans reacted to the Russian collapse and Bush's weak stomach, directors drew on the past for their stories. And were these films long, or what? Many of these epics played for over three hours, barely outlasting a wait in the bookstore line.

Oliver Stone's blockbuster controversy "JFK" relived (with several questionable embellishments) the president's assassination in Stone's unique yet complicated dramatic style. It seems that everyone was involved in the hit in Dallas, from the CIA to the KGB, from Cuban nationals to the Mafia, from one lone killer to the entire U.S. government. Go ask your parents what role they played in Kennedy's shooting.

To its credit, "JFK" is a powerful presentation of the historical event, complete with a star-studded cast. Kevin Costner is riveting as Jim Garrison, the New Orleans district attorney who first hatched the conspiracy theory. Joe Pesci spits and swears his way through another entertaining portrayal of an underworld figure. Sissy Spacek (as Garrison's wife) makes a potentially flat role interesting. Part of the unnecessary length of "JFK," however, is the numerous scenes between Costner and Spacek.

Without question, "Bugsy" was the hit of the season. The off-screen sparks between Warren Beatty and Annette Bening jump onto the screen with electrifying power. Instead of the usual gangster flick so popular today, "Bugsy" is a character sketch and a modern Greek tragedy. Beatty's Bugsy has everything a man could ever want, but one fatal flaw: his love for a woman. The lust and trust that result from that love precipitate his fall.

Not only are Bening and Beatty surprisingly good, but the film itself concentrates on a simple, effective plot to accommodate its characters. Passion and emotion are captured on-screen, complemented by well-filmed scenes. Look for "Bugsy" to walk away with a handful of Oscars, including Best Picture.

Among the other notable films released, "Prince of Tides" showcased my pick for Best Actor: Nick Nolte. Combined with his efforts in "Cape Fear," Nolte has shed his cop stereotype and has played demanding roles with skill. Jodie Foster's performance in "The Silence of the Lambs" should capture her the Best Actress award.

Steven Spielberg's "Hook" turned out to be a disappointment. Despite its hype, the film is an overdone extension of the classic "Peter Pan" tale. Robin Williams looks uncomfortable as a hard-nosed broker and then downright stupid as an aging Peter Pan. Julia Roberts irritates as Tinkerbell, especially as she suddenly wishes to be big and declares her love for Peter. Dustin Hoffman, as Captain Hook, is appropriately mean and nasty. While the film is entertaining, it is not quality storytelling. And by the way, Neverland looks eerily like the home of the Ewoks in "Return of the Jedi."

FAST FORWARD: Sean Connery returns to the big screen in "Medicine Man," set deep in a Brazilian jungle. Among the crude natives, Connery finds a cure for a major modern epidemic, but is blocked from disclosing it to the world. "Medicine Man" opens Feb. 7.

"Paydirt" is a suburban comedy starring Jeff Bridges, Rhea Perlman (Carla of "Cheers" fame) and Hector Elizondo. Their neighborhood becomes the site of a frenzied search for hidden treasure, and they stop at nothing to hit the jackpot. "Paydirt" opens Feb. 7.

Yes, straight from the basement of Wayne's house is "Wayne's World." This flick stars Mike Myers and Dana Carvey in the "Saturday Night Live" roles that made Wayne and Garth household names. Rob Lowe and Donna Dixon also ham it up in "Wayne's World," which opens Feb. 14.

REWIND: All the summer movies are out on videocassette, including "Terminator II," "City Slickers," "Doc Hollywood" and "Backdraft" to name a few. For a quality rental off the beaten track, try "True Colors" starring John Cusack and James Spader. The film chronicles friendship and betrayal within the power corridors of Washington, D.C.

CLIPS: Villanova's cultural film series gets underway with the tough urban hit "Boyz N the Hood." There will be four showings in the Connelly Center Cinema: Jan. 25 at 7 p.m.; Jan. 26 at 3:30 p.m. and 7 p.m.; and Jan. 27 at 7 p.m. Admission is $2 for students, $3 for general public.

Richards and Beck jam on

ROCK QUARRY

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"Hey, um, er ... yo, welcome to the Palladium. A stage I've been thrown off many times," cackles Rolling Stone guitarist, Keith Richards, affectionately known as the world's closest reference to the living dead. This quip is spouted at the beginning of Richards' live solo album, Live at the Palladium.

After much delay Richards finally went solo in 1988 with studio LP, Talk is Cheap, and gave birth to a new band, the X-pensive Winos. Here Richards seemed to wake up in the sense that his zest for performing increased while his signature musical gruffness remained.

Embarking on a short successful theater tour, Richards is used to playing oversized football stadiums where his distinct sound can sound muffled. However, in November of 1988 he shined like an old gold tooth. This live effort proves that Richard has the knack for sound and the meshing of each accompaniment.

Revived versions of "Time on My Side," "Too Rude" and "Happy" all take on a different angle than the Stones' versions. Richards tends to season them with more R&B than the Stones' rock-n-roll. Even with old Stoney gem, "Connection," his soulful sway is intact.

Renditions of "Before They Make Me Run," "Little T & A" and "I Wanna Be Your Man," although performed on tour, were excluded from this documentation for reasons unknown.

The remainder of the disc is basically live cuts of Richards' Cheap album. A majority of the songs sound better live due to guitar volume giving them extra bite. "Take It So Hard," "Whip It Up" and "How I Wish" exemplify this theory. Their directness and brutal honesty are their charm. The live version of "Struggle' even lets you understand the lyrics more clearly.

"Make No Mistake" becomes even more fragile than the original while "You Could Have Stood Me Up" bops along. Missed is "You Don't Move Me," Richards' ode to his press spat with Stones lead singer, Mick Jagger. Perhaps he spared the old bloke re-occurring nightmares.

"The man in the shadows," is a title Jeff Beck should carry. With the overblown images of dinosaur guitarists Eric Clapton and Edward Van Halen on both sides of the spectrum, it seems Beck is perhaps overlooked and underrated these days. Beckology, a 3-CD plus 60-page booklet, is long overdue.

Much like Clapton's Crossroads effort, Beckology covers six different eras in this guitarist/vocalist/songwriter/producer's career. Beginning with his first major outlet, the Tridents, on such songs as "Trouble in Mind," "Wandering Man Blues" and a live version of "Nursery Rhyme," all previously unreleased.

His Yardbirds material is vast (18 songs), including live BBC recordings of "Too Much Money Business," "The Sun is Shining," "You're a Better Man Than I" and "Love Me Like I Love You."

Dubbed as solo singles, infamous titles "Hi Ho Silver Lining," "Tally Man" and his one day stint with Led Zeppelin/Yardbirds guitarist Jimmy Page, Zep bassist John Paul Jones and The Who drummer Keith Moon on "Beck's Bolero" act as the set's best licks.

With a more developed sound, Beck and his Jeff Beck Group (w/ & w/o Rod Stewart) and the Beck, Bogert and Appice collaboration stretch his sound mixing blues, rock-n-roll and pre-heavy metal daze. Now classics, "Shapes of Things," "I've Been Drinking" (J.B. Group) "Blues Deluxe/BBA Boogie" and "Jizz Whizz" (B,B & A) hold their original essence as well as influential tones.

Newer solo material from albums, Blow By Blow, Wired, There and Back, Flash, Guitar Shop, as well as film scoring segments, are all equally represented. His latter work has more of a signature style that is well noted even on his guitar support on Mick Jagger's and Jon Bon Jovi's solo pieces which is easily pointed out. Stand out versions of "Wild Thing" (a 1986 UK single) and "Train Kept-A-Rollin'" ("Twins" soundtrack) shriek with power Van Halen would have trouble competing with.

Beck is also a man of many masks. His transitions frompsychedelia to rock to metal to jazz-fusion is monumental. He remains in the shadows because he chooses to be there. Flamboyancy is not his game, music is. At 47 years of age Beck is a phenomenon and Beckology is only a piece of it, but a strong one at that.

SINGLE SPOTLIGHT: John Mellencamp's "Love and Happiness" single with its vicious guitar riffs marks his return to rock. A dance club version will soon be available as well.

Enemy, Fresh Prince bust moves in rap fest

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"The World's Greatest Rap Show Ever" was how it was billed, "TROUBLE" is what it spelled. Sportin' its nine fly, too-cool-for ice acts, these rap masters housed the Spectrum Dec. 21.

First up was the wild, wacky Sons of Berserk. Their dapper appearance in slick suits was hardly enough to keep the audience's attention span.

However, A Tribe Called Quest had no problem busting their rhymes to jackin' tunes, "Jazz" and the classic, "Bonita Apple-Bum." Their rowdy style pulled the audience together, setting the base for the evening's plateau.

Next came the ladies of rap, MC Lyte and Queen Latifah. Lyte who is "direct from the planet of Brooklyn," popped out of a box donning her album cover while two pajama cladded male dancers jammed to her songs, "Extra, Extra," "Paper Thin" and "I'm All Dat."

The Queen arrived in her usual style, sprawled out in a throne fit for a queen. "Pump ya fista, in da air. And wave it like ya just don't care," cried the Queen as she fed from tracks off her Nature of a Sista LP. "Ladies First" and "Fly Girl" were her stamps as she dug her favorite crowd, as she referred to it as, "Fly Ass, Philly."

"Go, Philly! Go, Philly! Go, Philly!," cried street rappers Naughty By Nature as the base line of their tune, "Buckle Up" blared from the amps above. But it was their mega-smash, "O.P.P." which brought the crowd to such a frenzy, equalled only by a Flyers' Stanley Cup.

Homebased homeboys, DJ Jazzy Jeff and the Fresh Prince hit the tripped down stage hooded and serious. Breaking their happy boys o'rap image, their hit "Parents Just Don't Understand," "Girls Ain't Nothing But Trouble" and "I Think I Can Beat Mike Tyson" were dissed. Instead they were replaced with new material, "Things That U Do," "Ring My Bell" and "Summertime" from Homebase.

After the debut of their Steve Miller Band-sampled video single, "Slippin'," Kid N'Play faced the nation prancing and dancing about making the Spectrum their own "House Party." Their comical prowess and irresistible charm making them the Abbott and Costello of rap.

The out-of-placed Ghetto Boys, put the evening's momentum to a halt. Their gansta-rap was far too harsh and unenjoyable. Even their hit single, "My Mind's Playing Tricks on Me," was flat.

The star attraction, the boys who speak with both a voice of peace and a cackle, Public Enemy hit the stage like gangbusters singing their theme, "Public Enemy #1."

On a stage that evoked a war zone (complete with sand bags), heard Enemy Chuck D preached about equality, "Blacks can't get paid unless we have our own business. That ain't happening till the year 2000."

Meanwhile DJ Terminator X kept the tunes spinning and scratching as D's funny-man side kick, Flavor Flav (famous for his over-sized clock necklace and phrase, 'YO! BOYEEEE!'), sang his hits, "Can't Do Nuttin' Fo Ya Man" and "Don't Wanna Be Called Yo, Niga."

At the close of P.E.'s set and after hair-rising renditions of "Bring the Noise," "Fight the Power," "Don't Belive the Hype," "Can't Truss It" and their new single, "Arizona," a rather unique exhibition occurred. Chuck D, with the help of Flavor, hung a KKK dummy shouting, "This might as well be George Bush!"

This dramatic ending was a bit heavy for the crowd, who was out for a good time. However, although poignant, this caused the audience to get a bit too stirred up; to the point where both the floor and the parking lot became a war zone.

These dangers are overblown in newscasts but nontheless they exist. It's not the rap but the mentality of the individual. A majority is venting off steam, but it's far from harmless.

Regardless, "The World's Greatest Rap Show Ever" might not have completely lived up to its monstrous title but its attempt was amusing.

us productively. There was no pressure, no strings attached. We're not Skid Row (the Skids, discovered by Bon Jovi, ended up in financial straits with him squabbling over copyrights)."

Cindy did cooperate with Bon Jovi and Skid Row as well as Motley Crue, the Scorpions, Gorky Park and metal derelict Ozzy Osbourne in Russia for the "Moscow Peace Festival" in late summer of 1989. "That was a blast. Those people rocked hard! Imagine they never experienced that type of music before and here you have seven of the biggest names in hard rock playing all at once ... It was out of control," stated Keifer.

However, events like the "Moscow Peace Festival," although fun and amusing, might be the band's demise. Their sound is more advanced than offensive lyrics, skulls and bleached blondes in bikinis. They should rise out of the metal heap and gun for AOR competition before it gets too crowded. Keifer snaps, "We're in the running. Our music is growing. I don't need no Grammy to tell me that."

By BOB TRAVISANO
Staff Reporter

During the winter break the swim team was busy sending tidal waves over its competition. The women dominated the three-team Princeton Invitational Dec. 10 scoring a 1018 to Princeton's 809 while Brown finished with 746.

The men had a strong third-place showing with 792 points, behind Penn State's 842 and Princeton's 857.

Along the way, several school records were shattered. Lisa Flood set the pace in characteristically strong fashion with victories in the 100 yard and 200 yard breaststroke and the 200 yard Individual Medley. Although she finished second in the 400 yard Individual Medley, Flood managed a new school record of 4:26.08, while her time of 2:16.02 in the 200 yard breast qualified her for the NCAA meet in March. Freshman Tara Ryan established new school records in the 100 yard butterfly and the 100 yard and 200 yard backstroke. Mary Dowling and Meaghan McCaffery each received an NCAA optional qualifying time in the 1650 free. McCaffery also scored two qualifying times for the 50 and 100 freestyles.

For the men, Jerry O'Mara recorded a season's best in the 50 yard and 100 yard freestyles, and won the preliminary. Scott Fraser and Glenn Langhans each placed first in the 100 yard butterfly and 200 yard fly, respectively. Freshman Rob Drumm placed second in the 1650 freestyle, and his time of 16:01.68 allowed him to become the new school record holder for the event. The 200 yard free relay of Weber, Fraser, Holder and O'Mara came in first with a time of 1:24.06 and was also within one second of the school record.

Last weekend, the women continued their winning tradition with a 154-88 victory over Maryland and a 138-104 victory over LaSalle. Flood once again dominated in the 200 yard breast by blowing out the pack by almost seven seconds. Also, Dowling beat her nearest competitor by over 30 seconds to win the 1000 yard freestyle.

The men were not as lucky, scoring close defeats to both schools. In defeat, Drumm sparkled with victories in the 1000 yard freestyle and 500 yard freestyle versus Maryland and the 500 freestyle versus LaSalle. Ed Paradise also gained wins against both teams in the 200 yard breast. With these defeats, the men fell to 6-5-1. The women are at 7-1-1 and ranked No. 21 in the College Swimming Coaches' Association Top 25. This weekend the team faces Pittsburgh.

'Nova wins

NOTES: Reserve guard David Miller quit the team after the team's return from Hawaii. Miller, a three-year letterman, sighted personal reasons for his decision ... Head Coach Rollie Massimino notched his 350th win with the 70-60 win over No. 13 Syracuse last week ... Chris Walker is shooting 93 percent from the free throw line this year. He is currently ranked third in the nation ... The court date for point guard Chris Walker has been moved to Feb. 22. Walker, who hurled a basketball into the crowd after the upset win against Big East rival Seton Hall that struck a Seton Hall fan, commented on his action for the first time. "I just felt it was something that got blown out of proportion. I shouldn't have done what I did, but it was definitely not intentional." The student, sophomore Uchenna Uzoukwu, filed simple assault charges against Walker with the New Jersey State Police.

Cats struggle in Big East

By ED WASIELEWSKI
Assistant Sports Editor

The women's basketball team has dropped five consecutive Big East contests after opening conference play with a home victory against Syracuse University Jan. 3. The Cats' overall record currently stands at 4-10.

After successive home losses to St. Joseph's and Richmond, the Cats torched Big 5 rival Temple University for its first victory of the season behind an incredible shooting display by Rosemary Magarity. The first half featured two evenly matched teams, with 'Nova clinging to a slim three-point lead at the half, 32-29.

In the second half, the Owls came back to seize a five-point lead before 'Nova knotted the score at 45-45. Then Magarity took over. From the 7:22 mark, the senior forward scored 12 consecutive points to give her team an insurmountable nine-point lead.

"We came together as a team," said Magarity. "We stayed within our offense and pulled together."

In the second half, the Cats shot an amazing 62.5 percent from the field. Nikki Benedix, who had 15 points and 11 rebounds, shared team scoring honors with Magarity. Justine Chaverini turned in 12 points and five assists, and Michele Thornton had nine points and six assists.

Over the holiday break, the Cats lost their opening round game in the Wildcat Tournament to Siena University 57-56. Up by three at halftime, the Cats battled down to the wire as Siena's Liz Lops was scoring a game-high 20 points. 'Nova's adept passing resulted in 20 assists. Thornton led all 'Nova scorers with 15 points while junior Karen Connell and Benedix each contributed 12 points each for the Cats.

In the consolation game, Wisconsin-Green Bay defeated the Cats 64-58. 'Nova was outrebounded, 31-24, and managed only 39.6 percent shooting for the game. Benedix led the Cats with 15, while Magarity and Thornton each scored 11. The loss dropped the Cats record to 3-5.

In their Big East opener against Syracuse, the Cats squeezed by for a 53-51 win. Without 6-foot-5 Holly Oslander plugging the middle, the Orange were not at full strength. Nonetheless, the Cats were still badly outrebounded, 54-28. Despite this advantage, the Orange buckled under the Cats' pressure defense which forced 24 turnovers. 'Nova committed only three turnovers. Benedix again led all scorers with 16 while grabbing six rebounds.

In their next Big East contest, the Cats hosted the nationally-ranked UConn Huskies. With freshman phenom Rebecca Lobo (19 points, nine boards) and Meghan Pattyson (16 points, 13 boards) leading the way, the Huskies managed to pull out the victory, 57-54. Despite a 30-25 halftime lead, 'Nova could not maintain the momentum. The Cats were outrebounded 41-26 overall and 11-4 on the offensive boards. 'Nova also sent UConn to the foul line 20 times, where the Huskies connected for 13 points. Benedix, Chaverini and Thornton each had 11 for the Cats.

In their first Big East road game, the Pittsburgh Panthers defeated the Cats 63-56 for their first conference victory. Sophomore Jonna Huemrich (18 points, nine rebounds) and Carolyn Miller (18 points) combined to sink the Cats. Benedix had 16 points and Chaverini scored 15 and had five assists to lead the 'Nova attack. With the loss, the Cats dropped to 1-2 in the Big East.

In their first home contest after break against Boston College Jan. 15, the Cats once again were competitive in the opening half, trailing at the intermission by only one, 29-28. In the second half, the Cats struggled and allowed B.C. to shoot over 46 percent from the floor. Guard Sarah Behn led all scorers with 23 points. Benedix and Thornton had 19 and 11, respectively.

Coming off two disappointing losses, the Cats traveled to St. John's in hopes of snapping their four-game losing streak. Despite receiving 22 points, seven rebounds and three blocks from center Karen Connell, 'Nova still fell to the Express.

Magarity contributed 13 points and five rebounds. The Express were led by pre-season All-Big East pick Cozette Ballentine (21 points, 16 rebounds) and Pam Odom (13 points, 15 rebounds). 'Nova dropped to 1-5 in conference play and 4-10 overall.

The Cats host Providence tonight at 7 p.m. and Miami Sunday at 1 p.m.

Basketball Preview

The first-place Villanova Wildcats will take to the road this weekend for Big East matches against Providence and Connecticut.

Presently, the Cats are 5-1 atop the conference.

Villanova plays the Providence Friars Saturday night. P.C. is 0-5 in conference play, the biggest disappointment thus far in the Big East. The graduation of Eric Murdock, the Big East scoring champ last year, has devastated Coach Rick Barnes' backcourt play. Barnes is counting on junior Trent Forbes and sophomore Rob Phelps to pick up some of the scoring load due to Murdock's loss. Thus far the backcourt has not shot consistently, unable to shoot from beyond 15 feet.

Friar strengths include man-to-man halfcourt defense and team rebounding. Look for the Wildcats to concentrate their matchup defense on Providence forwards Marques Bragg and Michael Smith and center Dickey Simpkins. Villanova will make the Friars score with the jumpshot. Reserves Matt Alosa and Kenny McDonald will be counted upon to hit the three for Coach Barnes. For the Cats to come away victors, they must concentrate on defensive rebounding and forcing the jumpshot.

The Wildcats will draw the No. 7 team in the nation, Jim Calhoun's Connecticut Huskies on ESPN's Big Monday. UConn is 4-1 in conference play, 13-1 overall. UConn's success has been hinged upon the play of senior Chris Smith and a talented freshman class led by Pennsylvania State Player of the Year, Donyell Marshall. The Huskies' lone loss was Jan. 11 at duPont Pavilion. UConn will have revenge on their minds Monday night. Villanova was successful in the last meeting because of an aggressive halfcourt defense which limited senior all-America candidate Chris Smith to 6 of 21 shooting.

Connecticut specializes in full-court pressure defense. The Wildcats handled the Husky pressure well in the last meeting but look for the same type of game as UConn will pressure the Cats while Villanova will play matchup zones. Villanova will come away with a sweep of the Huskies if it can cut down on turnovers limit Smith and Burrell and create quality shot opportunities.

Men's Big East Week in Review

By JUSTIN KESTNER
Assistant Sports Editor

Another season of Big East basketball is underway and once again, the fight for the conference championship should go down to the wire.

SYRACUSE

The surprise of the season thus far is Syracuse. A perennial power, the Orangemen were predicted to finish fifth or sixth by many experts. With senior sensation Dave Johnson, who leads the Big East in scoring, and a highly-touted freshmen class that includes explosive slasher Lawrence Moten. S.U. has earned a national ranking of 13 and a first place tie in the Big East.

CONNECTICUT

The Connecticut Huskies are also off to a strong start. A blend of veteran players and young talent has propelled UConn into the top ten spotlight. The emergence of Scott Burrell as a prime-time player and the impact of freshman Donyell Marshall gives Jim Calhoun an array of offensive weapons. As always, the givens for the Huskies are ferocious defense, solid rebounding and the savvy play of guard Chris Smith, who is currently second in the Big East in scoring. Come March Madness, expect these Huskies to make a serious run for the Big East and NCAA titles.

ST. JOHN'S

St. John's has stumbled recently, losing badly at Seton Hall Jan. 20 and falling to lowly Miami. Recent injuries to frontcourt players Robert Werdann and Shawnelle Scott have weakened the Redmen's inside game. Coach Lou Carnesseca must rely on role players to step forward and relieve the pressure on SJU's top gun, Malik Sealy. But with solid overall talent and senior leadership, the Redmen should still be a major factor in the conference.

GEORGETOWN

Georgetown has also lost momentum. The Hoyas have already dropped home games to Villanova and Syracuse. Still a young squad, G'town is prone to turnovers and mental lapses. Even worse, the Hoyas have lost shooting guard and second-leading scorer Charles Harrison (11.4 p.p.g.), who transferred to a local community college to improve his grades. However, if John Thompson can find a way to feed the ball to Alonzo Mourning on a regular basis, Georgetown has the potential to beat anyone.

SETON HALL

Seton Hall has yet to live up to its preseason billing. Despite a monster game against St. John's, Terry Dehere lacks consistency and often tries to force his shot when the offense breaks down. Bryan Caver, Gordon Winchester, Arturas Karnishovas and Jerry Walker have played well for P.J. Carlesimo. However, unless Dehere and 7-foot-2-inch project Luther Wright can get on track, it could be a very disappointing season for the Hall.

PITTSBURGH

Pitt, like Syracuse, has performed better than expected. The Panthers opened the season with an upset at Kentucky and have maintained a strong level of play. With the return of point guard Sean Miller, fiery coach Paul Evans has a proven leader. He will need Miller because the Panthers for once have the depth, but little experience. Do not expect Evans and Company to finish in the upper echelon.

BOSTON COLLEGE

Boston College has already surpassed its total of conference victories from last season, when the Eagles managed only one. First, B.C. upended Providence. Then the Eagles traveled to Seton Hall and edged the Pirates on a last second shot by Gerrod Abram. With sophomore Billy Curley leading the way, B.C. has young talent that should continue to improve as the season progresses.

PROVIDENCE COLLEGE

Providence College is also very young. The Friars lack the horses to contend for the conference title, but they still have the potential to knock off some teams from the Big East's upper echelon. Prop. 48 returnees Michael Smith and Robert Phelps have yet to perform on a consistent basis. P.C. also needs someone to step up and establish himself as the point guard.

MIAMI

Miami has already opened some eyes with a surprising upset of St. John's. The Hurricanes have played teams tough for the most part and should not be taken lightly. Seven-foot-3 Constantin Popa will be a force down the road and freshman guard Michael Gardner has the tools to excel in the Big East. By securing one of the top recruiting classes for next season, the 'Canes could develop into a force a couple of years from now. This year, they will have to live for the upset.

Women's Big East Week in Review

By ALEX SCOFIELD
Staff Reporter

MIAMI

The women's team at Miami is suffering none of the woes that have befallen its male counterparts in adjusting to the Big East. Anchored by the play of Big East Player of the Week Frances Savage, the Hurricanes extended their perfect league record to 6-0. This week's victims included Providence, who fell to the 'Canes 87-83, and nationally-ranked Connecticut, 70-66.

GEORGETOWN

The Hoyas were one of three league teams to notch two victories in the past week. They scored a narrow victory over the St. John's Express, 68-67, and then slipped past the Lady Pirates of Seton Hall, 69-58. G'town's conference record now stands at 5-1, and they are 11-3 overall.

PROVIDENCE

After dropping their contest against the mighty Miami Hurricanes, 87-83, the Lady Friars bounced back with a 65-59 win over Syracuse, upping their league record to 4-2. Providence, led by Tracy Lis (24.2 p.p.g.), are the leading offensive force in the Big East, averaging 90.3 points each game. However, on defense, the team has allowed an average of 83.8 points per game, the highest in the league.

CONNECTICUT

After going into the week nationally ranked, the Huskies' league record dropped to 3-3 (10-6 overall) after two consecutive losses to Syracuse (68-51) and Miami. Wendy Davis, who is now 21 of 42 from three-point land in league games, was not enough to preserve UConn's prominent status in the rankings.

SYRACUSE

Although the conference's toughest defense (allowing 58.2 p.p.g.) allowed the Orangewomen to score a 68-51 upset over Connecticut earlier in the week, S.U. finished the week on a sour note in losing to Providence, 65-59. The split evened up their Big East record, at 3-3.

PITTSBURGH

With help from Erin Maloy, one of the Big East's most feared outside shooters, the Panthers won back consecutive league contests to raise their conference record to 3-3. After stumbling off to a 1-3 start in its first four games, Pitt found their form this week, downing Seton Hall 74-64, and Boston College 65-62.

ST. JOHN'S

The Express made a modest improvement in their record (2-4 Big East) this week by splitting contests against Georgetown and Villanova. After a tough 68-67 loss to the Hoyas, St. John's rallied back, topping the Wildcats 66-60. Though Cozette Ballentine has been vicious on the glass (11.3 rebounds/game), a true scoring threat has yet to emerge on the team.

BOSTON COLLEGE

Unable to escape the lower echelon of the Big East (2-4 conference), the Eagles dropped a conference game to Pittsburgh after beating Villanova 64-56. BC is now 1-3 on their home court despite the presence of the league's leading scorer, Sarah Behn, who is averaging 28.8 points.

SETON HALL

The Lady Pirates dropped their fifth consecutive game this week and remained entrenched in the Big East cellar with a conference record of 1-5. The two most recent losing efforts came against Pitt and Georgetown.

PLAYER OF THE WEEK:
Frances Savage, Miami

Behind the play of Savage, who won the league's Player of the Week award for the second time this season, the Hurricanes continued their domiance over their new league rivals. At the end of the week, she owned the league record for consecutive free throws by sinking 31 straight. Savage is the premier rebounder in the Big East (10.3 r.p.g.), and is also third in the league for scoring (22.7 p.p.g.).

ROOKIES OF THE WEEK:
Angel Lewis, Syracuse and Dawn Johnson, Seton Hall

Winning her second Rookie of the Week title, Lewis scored 12 points against UConn and 15 in a loss to Providence. In her first season, she is among the league leaders in scoring, three-point field goal percentage, and steals. Johnson, meanwhile, looked impressive in coming off the bench, starting a game for the Hall for the first time. She established herself by scoring 20 points against Pitt, and followed that performance by notching 12 against Georgetown.

Rollie hits 350, Cats crush Orange

By CHRIS ABELES
Sports Editor

Three weeks ago, the Villanova Wildcats were heading in a vicious downward plunge with a 2-6 record and their Big East rivals looming. But with a 70-60 upset of No. 13 Syracuse Jan. 21, the Cats stand atop the conference with a 5-1 record, 7-7 overall.

The Cats took a four game conference winning streak into the game and rolled to their fifth consecutive Big East win behind the offensive power of Chris Walker, Greg Woodard and Lance Miller all of whom scored in double digits.

Miller, who leads the team in scoring poured in 13 points, however it was the shooting of Walker and Woodard that paced the team to a second half run that led to the 10 point victory.

In that electrifying second half 'Nova made one of its patented scoring runs coming from nine points down to take a lead by as many as 14.

In this run, which Wildcat fans have come to expect, 12,417 fans watched at the Spectrum as Arron Bain, Walker and Woodard all hit crucial three-point baskets to put 'Nova up by nine with seven minutes remaining. After that basket and a Walker bank shot with 5:34 remaining, the Cats were up by 13 and held on, hitting all of their free throws down the stretch to win the game.

But the key in this game for Villanova was its mix of an inside and outside game. Marc Dowdell scored the first two points of the game with a put-back slam dunk to immediately establish an inside presence for Villanova.

"We had control of the inside game and used it to our advantage," said guard Lance Miller. This was an important point as the Cats' inside game held them within striking distance throughout the entire first half.

> We had control of the inside game and used it to our advantage.
> Guard Lance Miller

In addition to the scoring aspect of the inside game, 'Nova outrebounded the Orangemen 44-39, 17 of those offensive. Leading rebounders for Villanova were Miller, James Bryson and Calvin Byrd. Miller grabbed 10 while Bryson and Byrd ended with 8 boards each.

The second half included timely three pointers and precise foul shots that accounted for all but 18 of Villanova's points in the second half.

But certainly the most telling characteristic of Villanova's second half dominance was their smothering defense.

Syracuse, which in the past has characteristically had a very good inside game with players such as Derrick Coleman, Billy Owens and RonySeikaly, relies on a more perimeter-oriented game this year. The Orangemen shot 31 percent from the field and 25 percent from three-point land due to the defensive prowess of the Villanova players. In his opening statement to the press, Head Coach Rollie Massimino stated "I thought we played a terrific defensive basketball game."

Another positive note in this win was the emergence of a senior point guard from behind the towel waving and the energetic fist in the air. Walker, the emotional team leader, turned in another stellar performance, shooting four of five from the field and three of four from behind the three-point stripe.

The senior point guard has risen to the level of play that has come to be expected from him. After a rocky start, Walker has rebounded and settled into a strong offensive leadership position that has been an integral part of the team's turnaround. With his diving for steals and his energetic attitude, Walker possesses the ability to rally his teammates around his playing style. For 'Nova to keep up its remarkable level of play, Walker will have to continue to play and lead at this level.

Seven Cats qualify for IC4A

By LARRY LANZA

The Villanova men's track team highlighted its third meet of the season at the Florida Invitational in Gainesville by qualifying seven individuals for relays in the IC4A (Intercollegiate Association of Amateur Athletes) Championship.

Four of the qualifications came from the mile, where sophomore Mike Going was the highest Wildcat with a third-place finish in a personal best of 4:08. Finishing ahead of Going were only Brian Jaeger of Reebok and winner Dan Middleman of Florida (4:05).

"Mike is ready for a big season," said Head Coach Marty Stern. "He is a much improved athlete and is a major part of our program."

Also apparently poised for strong campaigns are juniors Brad Sumner and Terrence Mahon and senior Tim Pollis, who finished behind Going in respective placings of sixth, eighth and 11th, each in IC4A qualifying times. Behind Pollis, freshman Dave Hartman took 17th.

Returning for the relays, Sumner led 'Nova to a fourth-place finish in the 4 x 400 meter with a 49.4-second quarter-mile anchor leg. The Wildcats' time of 3:18 was fast enough to qualify for the IC4As. In that relay, Sumner joined with freshmen Kyle Watson and Chuck Silvester (fastest among the members, in 48.5) and senior Finn Kelly.

Kelly had already qualified individually for the IC4As when he ran 1:51 in the 800 meter to capture third. Finishing behind Kelly in that race were sophomores Lou Kahl (14th) and Mike Shemonsky (15th). 1988 Olympic Gold Medalist Paul Ereng of Kenya captured the event.

In addition to the 4 x 400 meter, Silvester and Watson ran on an all-freshman 4 x 800 meter relay which took second in an IC4A-qualifying time of 7:43. Joining the pair were Louie Quintana and Ken Nason, who helped the relay beat Georgia and finish one place behind the host Gators.

Already having qualified for both the IC4A's and NCAA's is junior Salaam Gariba. A week earlier at West Virginia University, Gariba qualified for the IC4A 200 meter and both the IC4A and NCAA 55 meter. At Florida, Gariba finished fifth in the 200 meter in 21.97.

Also at Florida, sophomore David Cook placed sixth in the high jump at 6-feet-7-inches and took third in his heat of the 55 meter high hurdles in 8.11.

Fonshell wins 3000

The Villanova women's track team turned in an impressive performance at the University of Florida Invitational held in Gainesville, Fla. Jan. 19. The Cats captured two events, qualifying three individuals and one relay squad provisionally for the NCAA Championships.

In the 3000 meter event, Wildcat runner Kate Fonshell qualified provisionally with a winning time of 9:29.95. Fonshell won the event easily, defeating the second-place finisher by 24 seconds.

In addition, the Cats captured the 4x800 meter relay event with a winning time of 8:50.69. The relay squad, consisting of senior Michele Torelli and juniors Irene Ruopoli, Chris Gentile and Cheri Goddard, also qualified provisionally for the NCAA Championships by beating out the second-place squad by over 44 seconds.

In the mile, two other Villanova runners were provisional qualifiers for the NCAAs. Junior Nnenna Lynch, who had a qualifying time of 4:46.67, finished second and sophomore Carole Zajac finished third with a qualifying time of 4:47.48. The race was won by Bonnie Ramsdell, who was running for NIKE.

Head Coach Marty Stern was happy with the way his team performed. "I want to congratulate our 4x800 team, Kate Fonshell, Nnenna Lynch, and Carole Zajac for their NCAA Provisional standards. Everything is on schedule for the championship part of our season," said Stern.

In their next meet, 'Nova will travel to Harvard University to participate in the New England Invitational, which will be held Sunday.

THE POINT AFTER

Despite loss to UNC, Cats are back

By JASON CARNEY
Staff Reporter

Things did not go too well for Villanova this past weekend in North Carolina. Having won four straight to even their record at 6-6, the Wildcats went into one of the most difficult places in the country to steal a win and played well for about 30 minutes. In the end, though, the tough, trapping defense of the Tar Heels prevailed, led by an outstanding effort from rebound machine George Lynch.

The Cats ended a surprising 10-day period, which included victories over ranked powers Georgetown, Seton Hall, and Connecticut. The victories enabled 'Nova to move into first place in the Big East, a far cry from when it started the season 0-3, its worst start in 60 years.

The Wildcats are now starting to produce as predicted in the preseason. The inspired play of James Bryson and Lance Miller in wins against UConn and the Hall have shown promise that perhaps the seasoned Wildcats will continue to surge forward in the rugged Big East.

Granted, Villanova's 7-7 record is mediocre. Its rigorous schedule, rated the most difficult in the country, tends to prevent many 20-win campaigns. But the fact that 'Nova has played eight games against ranked opponents will be strongly considered by the selection committee for the NCAA tournament.

This is the way Head Coach Rollie Massimino likes to play basketball. He schedules tough non-conference teams and hopes the schedule's difficulty, along with the Cats' hellbent style of play, will get Villanova into the NCAA tournament come March.

Though Massimino claims he prefers the fastbreak style of play, do not believe him. Villanova excels in the half-court game using its multiple varieties of defense to create offense. This style was displayed in the win over the high-powered Syracuse Orangemen. The Cats played tremendous defense and held the Orange to just 60 points, their lowest total this season.

The '91-'92 season has reached its halfway point and a tournament berth, once thought to be farfetched, is now within reach. 'Nova will need to finish in the top three in the Big East and have an impressive showing in the league's tournament to earn a spot in the field of 64. Historically, the one thing about a Massimino club is that you can never count it out. But the Cats will need to maintain this strong run in order to earn their third consecutive tournament bid.

The Center for Peace and Justice sponsored a trip for Villanovans to participate in the 19th annual March For Life in Washington, D.C., Jan. 22. Students, along with Villanovans for Life, were encouraged to take the opportunity to protest the Supreme Court decision of Roe v. Wade which was passed by the U.S. Supreme Court on Jan. 22, 1973.

The Roe v. Wade decision, which gave women the right to terminate unwanted pregnancies if they so chose, has been a major point of controversy for the past nine years.

The March For Life protest held this year comes at a particularly important time in the rather turbulent history of Roe v. Wade. It is at this time that the Supreme Court justices must determine whether Roe v. Wade will continue to serve as the law of the land when considering possible solutions to the problem of unwanted pregnancy.

A decision must be reached as to whether the Supreme Court will hear a case which will bring into question the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania law which would require pregnant women to inform their husbands of their unwanted pregnancies and their intentions to terminate them.

The new legislation in question would also require all women seeking abortions to wait a standard time of 24 hours in order to hear more information about the development of the fetus and alternatives to abortion.

Under the new policies, a pregnant woman under 18 years of age would be required to notify at least one parent before continuing on with plans to abort. If a young woman was unable to inform at least one parent of her decision, that woman would be mandated to stand before a court and petition for judicial approval to carry out the abortion.

Emotions run deep on both sides of the issue and activists representing either side are confident in the strength of their position. Abortion has always been a hot issue when referring to the views of potential candidates for political office and with a presidential election looming on the horizon, the issues stirred up by Roe v. Wade can only help or hinder the careers of many aspiring politicians.

While the battle rages on between those on both sides of the abortion debate, the question of whether or not a woman has the right to choose may not be the key issue. Instead, the restrictions placed on a woman's right to choose now seem to be the main points of contention. "They're not trying to outlaw abortion, they're just trying to make it more restrictive. That's the big controversy," said the Rev. Ray Jackson, O.S.A., of the Center for Peace and Justice.

Report of campus diversity not a big surprise

By JENNIFER CASTELLI
News Editor

The findings from a report surveying campus-wide attitudes toward cultural diversity that was released last week were no surprise to most of the Villanova community. Supporters and opponents of the movement to diversify the University all feel that in the wake of this report some type of change is inevitable, whether towards or away from diversity..

The Summary Report released by the Sub-Committee on Campus Climate discussed the findings from a campus-wide survey of attitudes regarding diversity. Members of the committee are hopeful that the results of the survey will bring about change, said Dr. Sheryl P. Bowen, committee co-chair, in an article entitled "Campus Diversity Focus of Committee," which appeared in the Villanovan Jan. 24.

"People who are serious and concerned about the Villanova community will take this report seriously," said Dr. Barbara Wall, director of the Center for Peace and Justice.

Some feel that it is a revelation that this is a mainly Catholic institution, said Mark O'Rourke, Student Government president. "They didn't need a Presidential Task Force to realize this," he said.

The report cited that few members of the Villanova community do indeed favor a change toward diversity, according to the Report of Findings.

Proponents of diversity disagree. "We have a community of faculty, staff and students who are committed to creating a more understanding campus climate, one that benefits the respect of each and every person," said Wall.

"Being sensitive and responsive to the needs of all the members of our campus family is a priority for the Board of Trustees and to me," said the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, in a letter regarding the campus-wide survey.

"I think that once Villanova increases recruiting on a national scale, we will see more diversity and these changes will be reflected in our enrollment," said O'Rourke.

The report found a lack of communication on campus about diversity and a reluctance to discuss the issue. "People who are in a minority will feel threatened by expressing their concerns. We need to create more vehicles for expression and a place where differences can be celebrated," said Wall.

Aftermath of the Gulf War affects the world community

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

It has been one year since the United States was engaged in war with Iraq and its leader Saddam Hussein. The search for a lasting and permanent peace in this volatile region of the world is not only a goal of the U.S. and Coalition forces, but is a major effect of the Persian Gulf War.

The Middle East peace talks taking place in Madrid, Spain, have brought together countries from the Middle East who under normal circumstances would not be communicating, said Dr. Ann Lesch, of the political science department.

"The crisis which could have been a very damaging one to the world environment as well as to the Middle East has turned out being manipulated in a way that could lead to agreement," Lesch said. Not that it is necessarily going to change, but at least for the first time the Palestinians and Israel are talking. This is a crucial step in forming a lasting peace in the Gulf region, said Lesch.

The United States is using a certain amount of political leverage to help facilitate the peace talks, said Captain H.S. Stoddard, USN. "The United States has also removed Iraq as a powerful military threat to its neighbors," said Stoddard..

One negative effect of the war is the "great distrust Arab countries have towards the United States," Lesch said. "The United States does not always understand the degree to which it is perceived as oppressing the masses and helping only the elite."

The sabotaging of oil fields and the fires that ensued both in Kuwait and in surrounding areas have had terrible environmental effects on the region, said Stoddard. These fires, however, are now extinguished and hopefully will not cause any more damage to the Gulf region, said Lesch.

BEIJING, China

The wave of democracy that swept through China in 1989 is still showing repercussions. The most memorable event, the protest in Tianamen Square, still simmers in the minds of people worldwide.

Most recently, the freeing of nine of the protesters has brought back the significance of the movement. A former student of Beijing's Politics and Law University, Wang Zhixin, topped the list of those set free.

The releases, which were disclosed one day prior to Premier Li Peng's voyage West, seem to be triggered by the government in an effort to gain international goodwill. After the Chinese army crushed the movement, many Western countries ceased high-level exchanges with the republic.

This week, Premier Peng is traveling to Italy, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland, and will attend a United Nations Summit in New York. It is believed the Chinese are seeking a one-on-one meeting with President Bush.

ENGLAND

With the Feb. 8 opening of the Winter Olympics fast approaching, a decision has been made that will keep one of the most popular athletes of the last games from participating.

Eddie "The Eagle" Edwards, who gained international fame at the 1988 games for his lack of ability in ski jumping, will be banned from representing Great Britian this year. He finished last four years ago, gaining his nickname more for his amiable, blue-collar personality than for his soaring.

Although he is England's top ski jumper, a new rule of the nation which allows only upper level competitors to represent the country will keep Edwards grounded. His spirits have not been dampened, however, and "The Eagle" plans to improve his technique in the hopes of soaring again in the 1994 Games.

MILWAUKEE

Lawyers this week are clashing over the sanity of Jeffrey L. Dahmer. Both sides have their work cut out for them. The heaviest task is on the hands of the defense, who must show that the serial killer was not responsible for his actions and should be spared a lifetime in prison.

The prosecution will try to prove that the man who admits to, among other things, sexually abusing corpses is sane.

In Wisconsin, a defendant pleading insanity must partake in a two-part trial. Since Dahmer pleaded guilty to all of his counts, he bypassed the step that determines guilt or innocence.

The burden of proof is on the defense in the trial, not the prosecution. They do not need to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt, it must prove it only "to a reasonable certainty by the greater weight of the credible evidence." Also, the verdict must be passed by 10 of the 12 jurors.

PHILADELPHIA

Over the past few weeks, the Philadelphia Anti-Drug/Anti-Violence Network and Teenagers Against Negativity has sponsored "No Gold" days at area schools. Assemblies, programs and observances were held to increase self-respect without the use of material items and to sway students from wearing clothing and jewelry that could make them targets of violence.

The very instances the days looked to prevent have appeared recently. Four youths in a stolen jeep sped from school to school, nabbing gold earrings and coats from three teenage girls. One girl, a student at Overbrook High, was even pistol-whipped for her possessions.

Police arrested three teenage boys and a 20-year-old man involved in the case and charged them with robbery, aggravated assault, simple assault and other crimes. The goods were returned to their owners.

Housing lottery '92 leaves more room for optimism

By TANYA C. RUSYNKO
Staff Reporter

There will be an increased number of spaces for upperclass students on campus next year, said Daniel Remley, assistant director of Residence Life for Housing Services. "The overall theme is optimism" in the lottery for students this year, he said.

In past years, 45 percent of all beds on campus were reserved for incoming freshmen. Next year that figure will be lowered to approximately 40 percent. Additionally, the projected number of freshmen next year will also be decreased by 125 to 1490 students, not all of whom will choose to live on campus.

The University may appear more favorable than in the past after implementing a policy which began with this year's freshmen class and guarantees housing to students for their first two years.

The current junior class is considerably smaller than the senior class, adding to the number of available beds next year. Those beds, along with the extra ones which will be available due to a smaller freshman class and a relatively small waiting list add up to many more available on-campus spaces for next year's juniors, said Remley.

This should put an end to the belief that juniors cannot get on-campus housing, said Remley. "That's simply not true," he said.

Although scholarship students are guaranteed housing, they too must enter the lottery. Only those athletes who are on a scholarship are guaranteed housing. Female engineers are also guaranteed housing, but they must enter the lottery as well.

Daniel Remley, assistant director of Residence Life for Housing Services.

The cut-off point will be raised to ensure that these students receive housing, but at the same time, it will increase the number of non-scholarship students who get a space on campus as well, especially juniors, said Remley.

"If they [scholarship students] choose not to apply, they are not protected . . . We try to be fair and consistent," he said.

"Remley believes that students can take an active roll in the housing process. Come in and ask questions, watch the deadlines, follow through and be optimistic," said Remley.

Kathleen Byrnes, assistant to the Dean of Students, aids students in locating off-campus housing and the legalities involved.

"I think the vast majority of people do find something that they're happy with," said Byrnes. Those students who do not make the lottery cut-off as juniors should, "stop by my office because that's really my function — to help students who want to live off campus," she said.

Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, said there will be no new dorms built on campus in the near future. However, this should not present a problem for next year's juniors.

The housing lottery cut-off points for the 1992-93 school year will be posted Feb. 11. Students will receive their lottery numbers prior to that date in their Kennedy Hall box.

Future construction could bring walkways, dorms

By SUSAN BURNS
Staff Reporter

Students will be seeing many changes on campus in the coming years, said John Gallen, executive director of Facilities Management, including the construction planned for the Spring Mill Road bridge, west campus and Ithan Avenue.

Since mid-summer, the bridge on Spring Mill Road has been closed due to its "structurally deficient" assessment by the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation, said Gallen. Traffic was thus directed away from the bridge, and onto Matsons Ford Road, he said.

Construction on the road, scheduled to begin in the late spring, will include two steps, a bridge with a vehicle lane and pedestrian walkway and jug-handles for easy entrance into the law school and St. Mary's Hall, said Gallen. These improvements will greatly help the flow of traffic on the road, he said.

According to St. Mary's freshmen Julia Funk and Heather Burr, the pedestrian walkway will be an asset to west campus students.

"It would save time during the school day going to Tolentine," Burr said, adding that she would probably use the "tunnel," the passageway under the railroad tracks behind Mendel, to travel to other places.

> It would give juniors and seniors a place to live on campus, safely, inexpensively, and under the University's thumb.
> Taryn Fleck, junior

"Because it will be well-lit, it will be much better to cross the bridge at night than to travel through the tunnel. You never know what could happen down there," Funk added.

In another project, four to five apartment complexes that will house 500-625 juniors and seniors are under consideration for the area west of St. Mary's Hall, Gallen said.

Though the proposal has not yet been approved by the Board of Trustees, it has received support from Radnor Township, he said.

"They're in favor of this concept," Gallen said, adding that if the plan is accepted by the board, construction will be targeted for fall 1994.

"It's about time," said junior Taryn Fleck. "Students now are in a no-win situation. The University makes it impossible for us to live on campus while the township makes it impossible for us to live

Student Gov't plans more for 1992

By JEN BORDA

The University Student Government has achieved much since the beginning of last semester and hopes to fulfill a long list of goals this spring, said Mark O'Rourke, Student Government president. "Last year we opened channels that have not been opened before. We had a sympathetic year with the administration and with various elements of the school," he said.

During the fall 1991 semester the Student Government extended Bartley Hall study and computer hours, reorganized the Campus Recycling Program, improved the quality of the Villanova Student Directory and hosted a Round Table discussion with Student Governments of local colleges and universities.

Student Government also supported a charity for cancer with S.N.A.P. (Student Nurses Association of Pennsylvania), made recommendations about solutions for parking problems, installed a computerized campus card system in the library, helped improve financial aid resources and facilities of the Career Planning and Placement Center and planned for pedestrian bridges over Lancaster Avenue and Route 320.

All of these recommendations were approved and some have already been successfully implemented.

Student government also made important recommendations to the Committee for Commencement Speakers and Honorariums and with the help of student senators made formal recommendations to the Board of Trustees and the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president.

University task force formed to combat AIDS

By JOHN MULLIGAN
Associate Editor

An AIDS Education Task Force formed at the University in recent months to coordinate a program that will provide students with information and counseling about AIDS, according to Gary Bonas, chairperson of the task force and associate director of Student Activities.

The goal of the task force is to give students the concrete knowledge necessary to make educated decisions concerning AIDS, said Bonas, who has assisted with other AIDS education programs on college campuses across the country.

The task force committee has been soliciting applications from freshmen, sophomore and junior students interested in serving as peer educators on AIDS. The peer educators will be trained initially to answer student questions about AIDS and will conduct AIDS education seminars in residence halls with various social groups, according to Bonas.

"We have not been successful in changing behavior patterns," said Bonas. Students hear about AIDS and although they are scared initially they do not change their social behavior habits, Bonas added.

"Peer education is the centerpiece of the program," said Dr. Michael Berthold, a task force member and English professor. "It is one thing to hear [about AIDS] from [faculty] and another to hear it from your peers," Berthold added.

Another AIDS program existed several years ago but was eliminated, said Bonas. The current task force was initiated by students who asked the Rev. John Stack, O.S.A., dean of Students, and Richard A. Neville, vice president of Student Life, about forming a student AIDS conference.

After the peer counselors are trained they will begin an "Ask me about AIDS" campaign. This campaign will be pro-active as counselors will go to groups, clear up misconceptions and remain available for individual discussion, said Bonas.

"My own imperative [concerning the task force mission] is simple. I do not want any of my students to die," said Berthold. It is also important for professors to involve themselves as well in any AIDS education program, Berthold added.

"I think an AIDS program is essential at Villanova. Students must realize that they need to listen," said senior Rachel Carlson, when asked her thoughts about the task force.

The AIDS Education Task Force is comprised of nine members, including Sherry Bowen, communication arts; Carolyn Bradley, junior; Lynne Hincken, drug and alcohol education; Ken Luthy, senior; Tom Malloy, facilities management; Paula Michal-Johnson, communication arts; David Wohlsifer, senior; and Berthold and Bonas.

The Villanovan regrets this error.

Homeless professor speaks to students at Cal State

College Press Service

When Len Doucette became homeless, he got angry. He wanted others to understand the humiliation, the hopelessness, the loss of self-esteem. So he began teaching a class about his situation.

"I want to get my students as angry as I am about the conditions — angry enough to do something about it," Doucette said. "The problem starts with misconceptions about the homeless."

When he first offered the course "Homelessness and Public Policy" through California State University at Bakersfield, only a dozen students showed up. That has changed.

His lectures — peppered with anecdotes of welfare agencies, unemployment lines, street life and experiences in overnight shelters — are not easy to listen to. Some students dropped the course after the first lecture.

"The students who do stay in, however, are very motivated and concerned with the problem," says Jaci Ward, a program coordinator for the college. "Mr. Doucette puts his ego aside and discusses the problem objectively. He's able to depersonalize it."

Doucette first became homeless four years ago when he was in an accident that cost him his low-paying office job. He lived in San Francisco, working part-time jobs that did not cover the rent. He is now temporarily living with a friend because he cannot afford rent on his part-time instructor's pay.

The outspoken Doucette, who says he does not allow himself to become discouraged, compares the current wave of homeless persons with the Depression of the '30s. "Except that now these people are single. The dissolution of the family is a contributor to this problem."

> I want to get my students as angry as I am about the conditions — angry enough to do something about it. The problems start with misconceptions about the homeless.
> Len Doucette

Doucette tells students that while the homeless issue is getting press coverage for the first time, the majority of the problem is hidden. "These people look just like you or me. But they are living with friends, or family — or in cars."

The class, designed by Doucette, features local speakers such as members of Congress and social agency officials. Then students are required to take part in five learning experiences and write a paper, expressing thoughts and feelings about each.

Doucette's curriculum instructions include the following: (1) Go to a location where the homeless congregate and stay one or two hours. (2) Render yourself homeless for a day. The maximum amount of money allowed on your person: 25 cents, no credit cards, no food. (3) Go to a non-profit agency and find out what is required to enroll in an assistance program. See how you are treated. (4) Go to a busy urban area and ask five people for the money for a cup of coffee. Note your strategies and the other person's reactions. (5) Do something to help a homeless person, making special note of how you view the person, and how you think the person views you.

"It is one thing for this to be an intellectual exercise and another to personalize the problem, to feel the lack of self-esteem," Ward said.

Doucette taught a similar course at San Francisco State University. The 55-year-old instructor says he wants to remind students that many people are "just one or two paychecks away" from the streets.

Health challenges in Haiti explored by nursing alumna

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

University graduate Geraldine O'Hare of the class of 1985 spoke about her experiences as a health practitioner in the country of Haiti Jan. 28 in Corr Chapel. Campus Ministry and S.N.A.P. (Student Nurses Association of Pennsylvania) sponsored the slide presentation and forum conducted by O'Hare. O'Hare spoke of widespread nutritional and medical strife in Haiti.

O'Hare is currently working with Franciscan sisters in a mobile clinic in Haiti. This mobile clinic travels to rural towns and provides medical care for the villagers.

When entering the mobile clinic, patients complete information cards and have their blood pressure measured and weight checked, O'Hare said. The patients then receive their consultation which includes a physical exam and the administering of medication if necessary, O'Hare said.

The people receiving medical care from the clinic are extremely poor, O'Hare said. Although the cost of the medication provided by the clinic is minimal, many are still unable to purchase the medicine with money.

The Haitian people, however, strongly believe "that owning what you are getting is dignifying," O'Hare said. In lieu of monetary payment, the Haitian villagers offer foods such as bananas, mangos and corn as payment for the medical attention and prescribed medication they receive.

Diseases such as tetanus, tuberculosis, measles, malaria and AIDS are common and widespread in Haiti, O'Hare said. Only 20 percent of all Haitian children are vaccinated against measles, diphtheria, polio and tetanus.

> In lieu of monetary payment, the Haitian villagers offer foods such as bananas, mangos and corn as payment for the medical attention and prescribed medication they receive.
> Geraldine O'Hare

Malnutrition and the diseases it causes are other health problems and challenges confronting the Haitian people, said O'Hare, adding that food is available to people who can afford it.

Small farmers usually have a cash crop such as peanuts, rice, corn or bananas and sell this to purchase other food to feed themselves and their families, O'Hare said. Buying from the black market cuts the indigenous trade which adds to the farmers' plight.

Haiti is rapidly decreasing in its ability to grow food because deforestation practices are stripping most of the topsoil away from potential farming land, O'Hare said.

Because of the lack of protein and vitamins in the diets of the Haitian villagers, numerous health problems arise, said O'Hare.

The illiteracy rate in Haiti is estimated to be anywhere from 60 percent to 80 percent. The oral tradition in Haiti is strong because illiteracy is great, O'Hare said. Therefore, medical instructions are given to the Haitian people in terms they can understand. "Take one at sun-up and one at sundown," she said, is a common way medical directions are explained to the Haitian people.

If the Haitian government does not function properly, it is like spinning wheels in mud, O'Hare said. Everyone's hard work to improve the conditions in Haiti becomes undone. "I believe there is hope for Haiti. The Haitian people are a tremendous example of faith and courage," she added.

Geraldine O'Hare's specialty is the nursing care of children. She practiced at the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia and in the renowned Albert Schweitzer Clinic in Haiti.

The Student Government also met with Dobbin once a month bringing "students to the forefront of the University," said O'Rourke.

During the spring 1992 semester Student Government plans to submit proposals to lower the price of basketball season tickets, place phones in dorms which only have hall phones, have "Midnight Madness" (a pep rally for the basketball team the night of their first practice), install a MAC machine which is accessible outside Connelly Center and install change machines on south campus.

They also plan to attend the NASCCU (National Association of Students at Catholic Colleges and Universities) conference in January, renew their membership in the AAUS (Association of American University Students), work to improve Senior Week, try to save fall break for future years, continue the recycling program and computerize the Student Government office, said O'Rourke.

They are submitting recommendations for the west campus project, to be completed in the fall of 1994, and changes in the current academic advisement process in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

"We also plan to revive the Intercollegiate Forum, which assembles various student organizations, and create an off-campus Housing Forum for the unfortunate victims of the housing lottery," said O'Rourke.

"Basically, the Student Government tries to sincerely communicate and articulate student concerns and interests to the University at large," said O'Rourke.

O'Rourke, who will complete his term as president this semester, said his main goal is to help overcome the apathy which has reportedly been characteristic of Villanova students.

"I think there is a vitality in the student body which is not appreciated, and I'd like to see the students become more unified on most issues," he said.

ble," said Wall, who participated in the groups.

Some thought that the methods of the survey were not entirely accurate. "There were flaws in the survey," said O'Rourke.

There is a lack of open forums on diversity on campus, said O'Rourke. "There is not enough debate and discussion of the issue. Both sides feel that they're correct and there is lack of compromise," he said.

Another battle facing proponents of campus diversity is the implementation of a multicultural core curriculum in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, and whether or not this report will have any affect on the issue.

off." Fleck, who is looking for an apartment for next year, said the going rate is $300 a month per person.

"It would give juniors and seniors a place to live on campus, safely, inexpensively, and under the University's thumb. It would give them the best of both worlds," Fleck said.

A different problem involves south campus students, who must cross Ithan Avenue in order to get to classes on main campus, said Gallen. Cars entering the parking lots or passing through the area cause dangerous situations to walkers.

Presently, plans are being designed and analyzed for a pedestrian crossing that will offer a safer way to cross the street, Gallen said, denying the absolute necessity for a walkway bridge. Tests are being done on the ground content and foundations to determine the most efficient structure possible.

Scandals stun campuses

By College Press Service

When a university president is embroiled in scandal, it seems to stun the campus and community like nothing else can.

In a recent survey ranking prestige in jobs, the American public ranked college presidents just below doctors and above astronauts, according to the University of Chicago's National Opinion Research Center.

Since 1988, the nation's academic community has endured a rash of scandals involving college presidents who have lost the confidence of students or peers enough to be ousted from office. Considering that 300 to 400 college presidents are selected for four-year universities each year, the number is quite low. But when a president falls, shock waves can reverberate for years.

"A college president becomes the image of the institution he or she serves," said James B. Appleberry, president of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities. "If that image is tarnished, there is rarely a way for the public to separate the president from the college or university."

After a campus scandal, beleaguered officials must scramble to clean up the mess. Often they are left to deal with a demoralized split campus, not to mention a severe leadership crisis and damaged community relations.

Presidential misbehavior, particularly involving sexual improprieties, is often fair game for tabloids and television programs such as "Hard Copy" and "A Current Affair," which drag the entire event, in embarrassing detail, into the national limelight.

Such was the recent case of Robert Altman, 45, the articulate, high-profile University of Central Florida (UCF) president whose penchant for massage services on out-of-town trips brught the demise of his presidency.

Altman, popular with the student body, was asked to step down in June after detailed reports of his trips appeared in a newspaper.

"These are positions of public trust," said Dr. Charles Reed, chancellor of the state university system of Florida. "Yes, we are judged and held to a higher standard than any other position in public trust."

Many students rushed to Altman's defense. Some said that college administrators may not get a fair shake once the accusations start falling.

Study reveals why we need to change

The Presidential Task Force on Cultural Diversity commissioned by the Rev. Edmund Dobbin, O.S.A., released its "Report of Findings" last week. Not surprisingly, the University was found to be "limited in diversity."

The study stated the "data support the perception of Villanova University being a predominantly white, Catholic, affluent and male-led institution."

Initiated a year ago, the task force concluded there is an "us versus them" attitude of non-acceptance in many aspects of community life, including gender, multiculturalism and political correctness. Also, most of the majority do not desire increased cultural diversity.

In order for Villanova to be a truly academic atmosphere, these intolerant attitudes must change. This general attitude of intolerance and disregard for change leads to the most basic question. "Why?"

Just because we live in a Catholic community does not mean we should close off from the world and "different" people because of their race or religion. To do so not only defeats the fundamental Catholic ideal of love, but the goal of academia. Close-minded elitism rejects the liberal arts education and, more importantly, the goals of a university.

How can we learn if we close ourselves off from views contrary to our preconceived beliefs in and outside the classroom? If we do, ignorance and intolerance will follow us throughout life and stain our attempts to create a better world.

Minorities questioned by the commission continually pointed to the feeling of "difference" between themselves and the white, Catholic majority. This intolerance is unforgivable. Those who do not meet "Villanova standards" should not be ostracized.

The diversity study may remind us of who we are. But it also helps us understand where we need to go. All of us must work to accept "others" and learn to embrace differences for our University education to be truly successful.

Alcohol abuse turns laughter into tears

How many of us see Villanova students stumbling between Main Line bars and campus dormitories? How many of us listen to frightening tales of the night a friend turned 21?

The issue of alcohol abuse often hides beneath other concerns. Yet, as the issues of multiculturalism, community and diversity rise and fall from our media, the problem of alcohol abuse remains constant.

Nobody likes to admit that alcohol abuse is a problem among college students. Yet, more than a few students graduate from Villanova as alcoholics.

The New York Times recently reported that the overall consumption of alcohol is down among college students. Yet, the same study reported a dramatic rise in "binge drinking" in the same age group.

We may not know anyone personally who has died from drinking too much alcohol. We may not even know anyone who has been hospitalized with alcohol poisoning. However, most of us know someone who has passed out or who has been sick after drinking too much.

Unfortunately, our society spends much of its educational effort paying lip-service to alcohol problems. If you or someone you know has an alcohol problem, confront it. The time is now. We must learn to take responsibility for our actions and our drinking habits.

Issues of MLK Day addressed

To the Editor:

I would like to thank the Villanovan for its very positive coverage of the Martin Luther King Activities. While I gratefully acknowledge the recognition given to me in one of your articles, I feel that if the story is to be really complete, I must acknowledge the dedicated, creative and resourceful committee members with whom I worked. Our committee was composed of a cross-section of students, faculty and staff. Committee members included: Gary Bonas, student activities; Rick Eckstein, sociology; Novelette R. Emery, social action; John Green, English; Eli Goldblatt, English; Maghan Keita, history/peace and justice; Ed Lordan, communication arts; Christopher Peters, Human Organization Science Institute; Jeannine Riley, Residence Life; Michel Slaughter, graduate student — Human Organization Science; Steve Smith, SCARR; Dawnee Watson, Black Cultural Society and Reggie Young, English.

I would also like to recognize the gracious and enthusiastic support of the faculty and staff whose informative and inspiring Freedom School presentations, video series discussions and poetry readings made the day so memorable. I should also recognize the many students who served as facilitators for the day.

Finally, I would like to thank all the Villanovans who energetically participated in all of the various sessions and came out in record numbers to the Candlelight Vigil and March.

There may be those who would argue that one day is not enough to affect any kind of change in the world, at a school or in a person. Our collective activities on Jan. 20 proved once again that we can make a positive and joyful statement, that we can inform and change preconceptions and that we can empower the dream.

Dr. Terry Nance
Communication Arts

To the Editor:

It was I that was disgusted with Pat Kennedy's and Nilesh Dave's Jan. 24 letter to the editor. As president of the Student Government, I made it a priority to attend several activities on Martin Luther King Day. However, these two students who were ignorant of my previous participation criticized me for leaving early after a few of the initial speeches.

Moreover, these two students do not have the same schedule that I have. I resent the manner in which these two tried to judge me and the unfavorable light in which they tried to portray me. I am not going to cynically observe and record the actions of other people, nor will I attempt to assume the motivations for their actions. Speculation is a very uncertain and unpredictable business.

I was there. I do not hold or expect others to follow my schedule or timetable. I invite Pat and Nilesh to visit the student government office in 204 Dougherty Hall to openly and candidly discuss the day's activities and significance.

One final comment to the Villanova community and specifically to those who are consistently negative and cynical: do not judge the actions of others and remember to keep your minds open to other viewpoints.

Mark O'Rourke
Student Government
President

To the Editor:

The major thrust of the Jan. 24 letter by Pat Kennedy and Nilesh Dave was their "disgust" at the low numbers of whites in attendance at the Martin Luther King Day events. While the lack of white student participation is disappointing, lack of student participation in general is commonplace at Villanova.

Apathy runs rampant on our campus. Lack of student support at most events can almost be expected. The low attendance last week should, therefore, not be taken as an anti-black sentiment. In addition, there are many Villanova students who may have been interested in attending the day's events but were unaware of them due to poor publicity, or unable to attend due to conflicting class schedules.

It is also unnecessary to single out and criticize someone who did attend but had to leave early for whatever reason. Such examples will only alienate other potential supporters. A positive attitude, instead of the hostile one shown here, would be a more effective means of attaining greater interest and participation.

These are three constructive criticisms which should be taken as such and used to increase attendance in future years.

COMMENTARY

Kangaroo court lines its pockets

By AARON NICODEMUS

I would like to know what Judge John T. Sachaczenski and the West Conshohocken Police Department consider to be fair and just. District Court 38-11-13 has brought charges of underage drinking to about 170 Villanova students. While they offer a trial, their consistent ruling of guilty in every case is a mockery of American justice. The citations list the infraction as "underage drinking," but it seems it does not matter whether the actual charge can be proved. The important issue to Sachaczenski is not protecting rights or proving guilt or innocence, but merely to accrue revenue for the borough of West Conshohocken.

On Nov. 8, 1991, I arrived at a college party in West Conshohocken with several friends. The party itself was so quiet that we had trouble finding the place, but we eventually did. After one half-hour, the West Conshohocken police busted the party in true cavalier style. They had undercover policemen, backup from two other townships, riot handcuffs and police vans to cart off all the "criminals." They rounded up everyone under 21 and dragged them down to the station.

The real fun, however, was far from over. At the station, part-time police officers wrote citations for some students and took addresses from others. While some students were thrown to the floor and handcuffed, others simply walked out of the station without any penalties. The situation was handled about as poorly and sloppily as any "sting" operation ever attempted.

The ridiculous aura of that night would soon appear again. Those honest enough to give their names to the police were mailed citations for $140 and cited for underage drinking under criminal code 6308. Many students, like myself, pleaded not guilty.

My case, I felt, was a strong one. I had taken a breathalizer test at the station and passed with a zero reading. I had been the "designated driver" that night, so the officer who issued my breath-test wrote me a note allowing me to drive my car. I had proof that I had not been drinking that night and I asked for a court date.

> "Did you ever feel, Mr. Nicodemus, that life is unfair?" I answered, "Yes."

Once I arrived in court, I realized that justice was not to be served that day. Officer Robert A. Solorio cited an obscure Pennsylvania court ruling for being "in the atmosphere of alcohol." He then ruled out all the breath-tests taken on that night, saying they were inaccurate and inadmissible. I wonder why were the police administering the tests. What did they expect to prove? And by allowing this evidence to be declared void, Judge Sachaczenski unmistakenly slammed his gavel down on any attempt at fairness.

I gave my case clearly and concisely, proving that I had not been drinking that night, I was a designated driver and I had not purchased alcohol. I had attended the party and that is not a violation under Pennsylvania state law 6308.

Judge Sachaczenski listened to both sides and then offered this fatherly advice: "Did you ever feel, Mr. Nicodemus, that life is unfair?"

I answered, "Yes."

"This will be one of those times," he said. "Guilty as charged."

It seems, then, that the lesson to be learned here is not to cooperate and not to be honest in a similar situation. By acting in this way, you will pay a $140 fine and suffer countless aggravations whether guilty or not. What does it say to those who are punished? Does it mean that we should do everything possible to escape the law? Police officers and judges will act more like tax collectors than agents of public protection. Apparently, in tough times like these, one cannot afford honesty in a guilt-free situation. The message of District Court 38-1-13 is loud and strong, and I for one have heard it.

Students commend community, disagree with tradition

To the Editor:

Recent editorial pages of the Villanovan have debated the issue of community at Villanova. While some cry out at the lack of community spirit, others have questioned the very idea of a "Campaign for Community." We on the Homeless Committee would like to acknowledge the degree of community that already exists at Villanova.

Homeless Awareness Day, the committee's fall fundraiser, raised $1,566 in donations for area shelters. However, this day served primarily to raise consciousness about the problem of homelessness and the direct role we all can play in being "Homeless Helpers." The success of Homeless Awareness Day indicates only a small slice of the community spirit on campus.

Each of our five committees consistently has student, faculty and staff volunteers who give of their time and talent every week. Professor Tony Coccia, philosophy, and Dr. Joe Thompson, political science, have been instrumental in the continuing success of our Habitat for Humanity campus chapter. Dr. John Cawley, chemistry, and his wife, Barbara, donate the bread for the sandwiches handed out by the streets committee. The Law School donated $1,400 to buy bologna and cheese from food services for these sandwiches. Marty Stern, women's track coach, donated sneakers to Philadelphia shelters. The Rev. John Stack, O.S.A., has been very generous in allowing our committees to use the Safe Ride's vans. The Rev. Ray Jackson, O.S.A., drives students to a soup kitchen every Wednesday. Villanova's student theater, Resident Assistants, dorm residents, sororities and fraternities actively help the homeless through our committees.

There are many more people at Villanova who should be recognized for their contribution to community through the Homeless Committee: local businesses, the athletic department, private donations. We would like to be able to mention them all here. The spirit of "Campaign for Community" is alive and well in the hearts of those who help VCPH. In the spirit of this Campaign for Community, we are grateful to these generous people.

To the Editor:

I wish to respond to Roberta Woodruff's letter that appeared in the Jan. 24 issue of the Villanovan. I do not intend to attack Woodruff personally, but merely the general sentiment of which her letter is indicative.

Ms. Woodruff, like many Villanovans, found a controversy over the length of a cheerleader's hair "upsetting." At a university supposedly overwhelmed with the concern over cultural diversity, an issue like this should generate controversy. According to the campus diversity article on page 1 of the same Villanovan issue, all respondents to the Cultural Diversity Task Force were "in favor of a more tolerant campus." This is a noble goal on paper, but the controversy many found upsetting indicates a marked absence of support for diversity in actual practice.

Secondly, I do not know Rollie Massimino or the reasons for his complaint. I also do not know Woodruff's relation to Massimino, but I question her ability to gauge his motives. I could claim that the confrontation was not "difficult" as Woodruff hypothesized, but arbitrary and obstreperous and be as equally unfounded.

Lastly, and perhaps most destructive, was Woodruff's defense that Massimino's actions were merely related to taking "comfort in a tradition." The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, initiated the Cultural Diversity Task Force to confront just this sort of "comfort in tradition."

Cultural diversity is about battling the stagnant, dated practices that people everywhere blindly cling to and rally around in the name of tradition. Now is not the time to be nostalgic, but a time to open our eyes and re-evaluate our motives, practices, and traditions. This was more than a disagreement over how long hair should be. It was a manifestation of cultural diversity, or lack thereof, on Villanova's campus.

COMMENTARY

Loyalty to candidates is still very shallow

By ELLEN GOODMAN

The segue from the Super Bowl to "60 Minutes" was ominous. As the credits to the largest male-bonding, testosterone-loading sporting event of the year rolled by, there was Prince singing: "Cuz I'm willing and able/And ready to place my cards on the table."

Minutes later, there was Bill Clinton, willing and able to place the pack on the table, but not about to turn over any Queen of Hearts for public inspection. The candidate admitted to wrongdoing but spared the details. Asked the "A" word, he said what he has said before, "I'm not prepared tonight to say that any married couple should ever discuss that with anyone but themselves." And I suspect that the public, queasy after Long Dong silver and' Talking Gray dots from Palm Beach, felt more relief than disappointment.

This is not Monkey Business in 1988. It is private business in 1992. Bill Clinton is no Gary Hart, the National Star is no Miami Herald and Hillary Clinton is neither Lee Hart in '88, Joan Kennedy in '80 nor as she put it, Tammy Wynette.

"You know, I'm not sitting here like some little woman, standing by my man like Tammy Wynette," said the feisty lawyer and gritty wife. "I'm sitting here because I love him, and I respect him and I honor what he's been through and what we've been through together. As you know, if that's not enough for people, then heck — don't vote for him."

Clinton's own best minute in the 12 minutes of "60 Minutes" was his unrehearsed reaction to Steve Kroft's suggestion that the couple had an arrangement. "Hey, wait a minute" he said. "You're looking at two people who love each other. This is not an arrangement or an understanding. This is a marriage." At least Bill Clinton would not call for an international conference — forgive me, Michael — if his wife were raped.

I do not know if this interview will de-flower the Clinton campaign and get the issue behind him. But in the lengthy American seminar about sexual morality, about the private lives of public figures, about the press and privacy, it looked a lot like a clarifying moment.

After all, I never thought the Gary Hart debacle was a story of character assassination, but rather one of character suicide. It is not coy to say that many of us were less concerned with sex than with stupidity, hubris, dishonesty, exploitation, carelessness, ever compulsive risk-taking-any of the above-and what these characteristics would mean in the Oval Office.

But there was, and often is in sexual matters, an uncomfortable alliance between people who arrive at the same point of view from wholly different directions. In the Hart case it was not just the sleazoid and the serious media who became strange bedfellows. So did the religious right and the secular left, puritans and feminists, those who condemned him for breaking his vows to God and those who condemned him for the look in Lee's eyes.

We hold two very different sets of moral attitudes in America. One is essentially about obeying commandments. The other is about relationships. The first is as straightforward as sin. The second is as complicated as human feelings. The first asks God for forgiveness. The second asks his wife.

These differences may seem too stark. Many Americans go back and forth between the polls. But the differences are real. One moral view is focused on heaven's wrath, the other on human pain. One holds a single judgment about the meaning of adultery in every life. The other is sure that adultery says something about a person. But when asked what, they are likely to say: It depends.

The union that held these cultural opposites together in dumping Hart, splits in two when faced with the Clintons' story. This is a husband endangering his marriage, not his eternal soul. This is a wife who is not a victim but a partner. Together they ask a valid question whether the public allows second acts in first marriages. Whether the public should judge what the couple has resolved.

The CBS poll said that 14 percent of the public would not vote for anyone who committed adultery. That 14 percent would not vote for Jerry Brown, who went around with Linda Ronstadt, or for Bob Kerrey, who dallied with Debra Winger. They might think Paul Tsongas' cancer was God's judgment and Tom Harkin is the liberal from Hell. Not much to lose there.

But a "60 Minutes" performance is not an election. You can approve of the marriage without voting for the man. This is not a referendum on the press but a campaign for the presidency. Loyalty to any of these candidates is still very shallow.

The Clintons played their hand as well as possible. For some he is simply and irrevocably cast as a knave. But in the vast and ongoing debate over private lives, most Americans can put the sex card back into the full deck.

LETTERS

Letter questions motives of attack

To the Editor:

I was sorry to see the article "Klein Refutes Charges" in the Dec. 6 the Villanovan. While I hardly expected Klein to applaud my article concerning his attacks on Villanova's Center for Arab and Islamic Studies, his irate response took me off-guard. Not only did he write an article attacking my opinion and further condemning the Center, he also had his lawyer call and threaten me with a libel suit. My roommate, who was present at the time, was as amazed as I at the audacity of such a threat.

After all, what is the First Amendment all about? How can one claim to be a loyal American and at the same time attack the fundamental principle of freedom of speech? And what about the purpose of the University? A person who resorts to intimidating those with opposite views is surely insecure about his own position.

I am currently enrolled in the Center for Arab and Islamic Studies and find the program extremely profitable and enjoyable. I am not pro-Arab. I am not pro-Israeli. I am simply an inquisitive American who wants to understand a region whose history is rich in culture and often riven with strife and conflict.

The claim that the Center for Arab and Islamic Studies is anti-United States is so absurd that it angers me. Perhaps in some of the lectures the policies of our government or Israel's government were criticized (it is important to know that the Arab countries have been criticized as well), but one must realize that any criticisms have been aimed at policy. Does it make me anti-United States to criticize a particular government policy? Absolute nonsense.

I love my country intensely. If I criticize it, it is out of concern that it may be straying from its course of moral decency and rectitude. For if we do nothing but blindly accept our leaders and all their policies, we have done our country a grave disservice. A democracy requires its people to be inquisitive and critical lest the power they entrust in their leaders be abused.

Villanova's Center for Arab and Islamic Studies can do nothing but enhance the University's prestige, and I feel that the attacks on the program have been motivated by bias and misapprehension.

Have you heard of Campaign for Community? If so, do you think it has opened new lines of communication about diversity on campus?

No, I have not heard about it. It sounds like it was a good idea that nobody ever followed up on.

Yes, I have heard something about it. It sounds as if the idea of it was to get Villanova on the bandwagon of "diversity." It is like a politically correct kind of thing.

Jennifer Jones

I vaguely remember it. I really have not seen much progress made in communicating about differences. There is a general apathy on the campus concerning this matter.

Brian Katulis

I have heard of it. I think the idea sort of died. It takes more than a "Campaign for Community" to make the campus diverse. We need to put into action what we say.

SCA puts students to work for the environment

By KAREN CAMPBELL
Features Editor

With all of the recent hype concerning ecologically correct practices, we are often faced with confusing choices — plastic or paper, Styrofoam or glass? Should you damn future generations to an environmental hell by using aerosal spray? Will forfeiting all modern amenities make an ecological dent in the problems facing our generation?

Often these choices seem insignificant in view of our rapidly disappearing resources. But now concerned students can make a personal contribution to the state of the environment. The Student Conservation Association (SCA) provides volunteers the opportunity to work for the better management and conservation of our nation's parks, public lands and natural resources. Instead of making decisions which may positively affect the environment in the long run, students can battle today's ecological challenges first-hand.

"This year, SCA celebrates not only its 35th anniversary, but also a year characterized by unsurpassed growth. Since 1957, when founding president Elizabeth Titus, a bright young college senior, envisioned 'young people serving as volunteers in our national parks,' the Association has challenged more than 20,000 such volunteers while broadening the depth of its programs and the diversity of its character," informs the SCA 1991 annual report.

In 1957, SCA started out with 53 volunteers working in Grand Teton and Olympic National Parks. Over the years the scope of the organization has greatly increased to include many more core projects. SCA offers high school students a chance to change the future of their world through work groups in the High School Program. The Resource Assistant Program caters to older students and volunteers who desire intensive training in environmental service and career opportunities.

Last year saw the installation of many new projects. SCA published East Work magazine, a combination of job listings in environmental fields and articles pertaining to subjects of interest to conservation professionals. The Conservation Career Development Program was another new project for 1991. Its goals included "motivating young people to assume responsibility for the environment and increasing minority representation and leadership in the public and private conservation work force." Also in 1991, the Mexico-United States Conservation Leadership Exchange (MUSCLE) and the Soviet-American Exchange found success in bridging international gaps through environmental means.

In addition to these new programs, standard SCA projects enjoyed continued approval from environmental organizations. Some of these projects include the New Hampshire Conservation Corps, the Greater Yellowstone Recovery Corps and the Henry S. Francis Jr. Wilderness Work Study Skills Program.

SCA's success has not damaged the ideals upon which the organization was founded. "Despite its stupendous growth and a family that cares deeply about what happens to young people and what happens to the earth ... The qualities of hope for the future, caring for the present and respect for tradition continue to characterize the institutional ethos of SCA," said Kathleen Selz, SCA chairperson.

Sam Davis, an SCA intern who works as an interpretive park ranger at the Cumberland Island National Seashore, vouched for the value of time spent with SCA. "The experience I gained with SCA is invaluable." said Davis. "The stiff competition in other job markets carries over in this field also. So companies are looking for job applicants with experience. SCA interns are often hired by the National Park Service, the Bureau of Land Management, the Navy or many other private organizations with ecological concerns."

Currently, SCA is extending an invitation for students to become part of its family. Approximately 1,000 expense-paid volunteer positions need to be filled for 1992.

If interested in making a difference in the future of conservation and natural resources, look into the opportunities SCA provides. More information about participating in or learning about SCA programs can be obtained by contacting: SCA, P.O. Box 550, Charlestown, N.H. 03603, (603) 826-4301.

'Novan goes pro, cheers for Eagles

By MONTA MONACO
Features Editor

Toshya Bazemore, known to her friends as Nikki, embarked on the adventure of a lifetime last spring. Bazemore was just an ordinary freshman last year at Villanova. About a week after a stressful round of finals in May, Bazemore accompanied a close friend to Veterans Stadium one Saturday morning to try out to be a Philadelphia Eagles' cheerleader. After a month of grueling tryouts, Bazemore was made one of 12 rookies on the squad.

Bazemore said that 690 women tried out for the 36-member squad. She sarcastically refers to the first round of tryouts as "the cattle call" because the women were lined up around the stadium.

Bazemore noted that the women were not given much description of what the tryouts would be like or any time to prepare. "We had no idea how many spots were available, how many women they were going to choose or what they were looking for. They didn't tell us anything but the time and the place," she said.

The 690 women were broken down into groups of 10 and were paraded in front of the judges in their respective groups. The women had to stand in front of their number in front of the judges, who played a random song and told the women to "just dance." The songs ranged from "Make You Sweat" by C&C Music Factory to "Pink Cadillac" by Natalie Cole.

The judges cut the number down to 400, and the women were put through the process again. The next cut brought them down to about 200. These women were given packets explaining exactly what the chosen few would be getting themselves into.

"Basically, they own you for a year. They tell you to cut your hair; your hair is cut. There are no ifs, ands or buts," said Bazemore.

This round took a few weeks. The women learned a new routine every Tuesday and cuts were made on Wednesday. The final week of tryouts, the women were expected to go through a personal interview before a panel of celebrity judges. At this point there were about 60 women left, and the judges asked them one morality question and one question about football. The squad is required to know the sport. There is a mandatory two week football clinic every year.

The tryouts were completed with each woman performing one of the dance routines learned in prior weeks.

"It's really bad because women are crying and bawling. There are women that have come back four years in a row and have been cut every year," said Bazemore.

Bazemore called practice "disgusting and terrible." The squad practices twice a week during football season. Similar to tryouts, the women learn new routines on Tuesdays and perfect them on Wednesdays for Sunday games. The cheerleaders have to be in the stadium four hours before kickoff.

Although the women must weigh in, numbers do not really matter. Looking good is all that counts. According to Bazemore, the weight checks are simply to discover great fluctuations.

"I wish I could take everybody to a practice as well as a game. The only thing that makes me mad about being a cheerleader is

Jackson fulfills long-time goal

By PEGGY AGOLINO
Assistant Features Editor

Since 1985 the Rev. Owen (Ray) Jackson, O.S.A., has been spending his summers on the second floor of Falvey Memorial Library diligently working on a unique project. All of his time and dedication has resulted in one of the first peace and justice textbooks ever written, Dignity and Solidarity — An Introduction to Peace and Justice Education.

The Peace and Justice program at Villanova began in the mid-1970s, and the first Introduction to Peace and Justice course was offered in 1976. Jackson is a campus minister at Villanova and is the peace and justice representative for Campus Ministry, as well as a part-time teacher. He usually teaches two courses per semester. One course introduces the topic of peace and justice education. The topics of the other course vary, including subjects such as modern peacemakers, faces of the needy or one credit mini-courses on topics such as non-violence, economic justice or Martin Luther King Jr. Jackson is the faculty coordinator of Hunger Awareness Week, is involved with the Pre-Cana marriage discussions and also facilitates Marriage Encounter Weekends.

> "The title of the book expresses the two most important values he wants to get across to readers: personal dignity and solidarity."

Jackson said he wrote his book for the students. Due to a lack of material in the area of peace and justice education, he felt a basic introductory textbook was needed. Jackson said his book differs from the small selection of other similar books because his deals not only with issues, but with values. The title of the book expresses the two most important values he wants to communicate: personal dignity and solidarity. In the preface of his book Jackson states, "This book is an attempt to place these ideals in an educational context in order to offer a way of learning that will help students to mature in both mind and heart."

While Jackson was creating his book, he would use his material in class and get feedback from his students. He would examine these comments and often rewrite or alter parts of his book based on them. In 1989 he began sending out chapters of his nearly-

Magazines showcase talent

By VALERIE JONES
Staff Reporter

A common Chinese idiom proclaims "the world is always ready to receive talent with open arms." This concept is demonstrated on the Villanova campus now. Two organizations are working to spread the literary talents of Villanovans in our own small part of the world. They are the two campus literary magazines, Uses and Polis.

Broadly defined, both magazines are composed of creative works submitted by Villanovans, consisting mainly of poetry, but also including essays, short stories, photographs and art work. The main difference between the two magazines is the fact that Uses is a Villanova student organization while Polis is run out of the honors department. However, staff recruitment and literary submission to Polis is not limited to honors students. Anything can be submitted, but selection depends upon the reactions and decisions of the Polis staff.

> "We don't want to compete, we just want to put out our magazine, and I think there is room for both magazines on campus."
> Jennifer Ehlers

"We are not looking for a particular mind-set or style. We like to get a lot of different things and we don't like to define exactly what we are looking for," said Polis editor Mike Knab.

Both magazines hold several staff meetings right after the deadlines to determine which submissions will be included. The next Uses deadline is Feb. 15. Afterward, each member of the Uses staff is given photocopies of all of the submissions, which are then discussed at weekly meet-

Roe vs. Wade continues to spark controversy

Controversy raged again in Washington, D.C. as protestors gathered to voice their views on the nation's abortion laws.

By GRETCHEN FISHER
Assistant Features Editor

The Supreme Court ruled in a landmark decision to legalize abortion in the United States Jan. 22, 1973. The controversy surrounding this decision has led to the formation of two of the largest movements in the United States, the right-to-life movement and the pro-choice movement.

These movements were in opposition last Wednesday at the "March for Life" in Washington, D.C., an annual event sponsored by the right-to-life movement to protest the legalization of abortion. Nearly 100,000 people attended the rally. Shouts by the pro-choice faction such as "Abortion on demand; no apologies" and "Our bodies, our lives, our right to decide" were met with replies by the pro-life group such as "It's a child, not a choice" and "Abortion stops a beating heart."

Present at this event was the Villanovans For Life group, Villanova's chapter of the pro-life movement. President Kristen Haaf explained that the group was founded in the late '70s to inform the Villanova community about the pro-life issues of today and to offer them the opportunity to become involved in the movement.

Dr. Joseph Betz of the philosophy departments is the moderator of the group. He explains the reason for his involvement is so "that human lives may be better protected, enhanced and fulfilled than they might be otherwise."

Haaf stressed that the group wishes to see every human life respected, and is therefore concerned about the woman receiving the abortion in what she describes as "our country's most unregulated industry." Abortion is the only issue on which the group takes a definite stance, and the individual members' opinions vary on other issues such as capital punishment.

When questioned if the group condones abortion in cases of incest and rape, Haaf declared that although the father may be a criminal, the child is innocent. She sees abortion as taking a human life, in whatever circumstance it was conceived. She feels that advocating abortion on the grounds that the life of the mother is in jeopardy has become polarized and overblown and cited that only a very small percentage of abortions are performed because of these three circumstances.

Villanovans for Life recently drew "The Cemetery of the Innocent" on the quad in an attempt to bring across to people the fact that 4,400 abortions are performed daily, totaling 1.6 million a year. Haaf explained that although the group was braced for some harsh criticism, the response has all

Speaker highlights health woes in Haiti

By KRISTIN BRIGGS
Staff Reporter

The Student Nurses Association of Pennsylvania (S.N.A.P.) and Campus Ministry sponsored Geraldine O'Hare as a guest speaker at their presentation "Health Challenge in Haiti" Jan. 28.

O'Hare, a 1985 graduate of the Villanova nursing program, has visited Haiti, the poorest nation in the Western Hemisphere, four times and stated in her speech that "the nation is getting poorer as days go by."

In this country, whose average life expectancy is approximately 50 years of age, only 30 percent of Haiti's people have access to water clean enough to drink. Many of its people suffer from health problems resulting from this poor sanitation. Haitian children become immune to the effects of the poor drinking water at the age of five. However, "only 50 percent of them make it to the age of five," said O'Hare, while also citing to diarrhea and fever as primary causes of infant deaths. Eighty percent of the population is illiterate.

O'Hare first visited Haiti with Campus Ministry. On each of her three subsequent visits to Haiti, O'Hare has done volunteer work using the nursing skills she acquired here at Villanova.

In September 1988, she returned to Haiti for four months as a private-duty nurse. On her third trip in 1990 O'Hare co-led a group of 10 Villanova students. On this visit, more sight-seeing than clinical work was done in order to give the visiting students "a taste of a Third World nation," said O'Hare. The group tours enabled them to visit an orphanage, Mother Theresa's home for the dying and various clinics. The students' week-long trip to Haiti was undoubtedly an eye-opening experience for these first-time visitors to the poverty-stricken and overwhelmingly illiterate nation.

> On her third trip in 1990 O'Hare co-led a group of 10 Villanova students.

O'Hare's most recent visit to Haiti began in July 1991 and ended in December of the same year. During this visit she worked in a mobile clinic with The Franciscan Missionary of Our Lady, a clinic out of Baton Rouge, La. which sends its volunteers to five or six villages to care for the sick.

O'Hare is currently planning a return trip to Haiti to continue her work with the mobile clinic. Although her work in Haiti is strictly volunteer, O'Hare said that she is fully rewarded by the appreciation of the nation's people.

Villanova engineers were hard at work during the semester break to better the lives of others.

By JOHN MULLIGAN
Associate Editor

Engineers can leave a significant mark on the world through their work. Most people assume that engineers are taught only to design with their minds and create with their hands. A common stereotype holds that skillful engineers work hard to achieve an ultimate goal of financial success.

Yet, as the work of 11 Villanova University students prove, such stereotypes are shallow. Together with another student and the Rev. Joe Mostardi, O.S.A., these engineers travelled to Wacuco, Panama to lend their engineering skills to a village of Chokoe Indians during the week of Dec. 31-Jan. 10.

What they found may surprise you: an engineer's work and products transcend mere concepts and concrete. In fact, an engineer may build with heart rather than mind and produce bridges of community rather than bridges of steel.

Advertised early last semester, the trip provided engineering students with an opportunity for hands-on experience.

"We worked through a Franciscan mission that serves 38 villages. Our village was called 'Ipeti' and it was on the edge of a jungle," said Mostardi, who ventured into the wild on a few occassions with the natives.

The villagers had a calendar of projects needing attention. The Villanova engineers focused finally on a dirt bridge crossing a dry river bed. During rainy season, it often washed out. The job of the engineers was to build two retaining walls of concrete that would channel floodwaters through two concrete pipes and prevent erosion of the dirt.

The Indians were very receptive and inviting, said Mostardi. "I guess my expectations [prior to the trip] could be decribed as apprehensive because of where we were going and what we were doing," he added.

However, he noted how well the group of students interacted with the Indian community. "Once the inhibitions were dropped and people realized [the project] would work, it really came together."

The Indians spoke primarily Spanish with the group. Mostardi stated that the communication barrier was quickly overcome. Although only a few students spoke Spanish, "I acted as a translator, but we also used sign language and drew pictures in the sand," Mostardi recalled.

"My best memory was sharing responsibility with one of the Indian elders," says senior Tom Brinker. "He would fill a reservoir with water and release it to the village during the day. Water was esstenial to his community and he took pride in his work."

By the trip's end two bridges had been built, said Mostardi. The group worked with both their hearts and minds and found true community. "Not only did we make a bridge of concrete but we also built a cultural bridge," Mostardi concludes happily.

Zipperhead hits Main Line

By VICKI SOLOT
Special to the Villanovan

Look out Main Line students. Here comes Zipperhead with its leather bustiers, Grateful Dead t-shirts, tie-dyes and vintage garb. Main Line students will have some options that will knock their argyle socks off this semester with the opening of the Ardmore branch of Philadelphia's renowned rock 'n' roll boutique, Zipperhead.

The store, located at 36 W. Lancaster Ave., next to Ardmore Theater, caters to a young market with individualistic fashion tastes. According to the boutique's owner, Rick Millan, "the Ardmore store is a toned-down version of the unconventional, sometimes outrageous fashions that have given Zipperhead its distinctive edge." The new store will have a heavy dose of vintage clothing, from '40's-era sports jackets to '60's tie dyes, to complement the leather and metal that are the Zipperhead trademark.

Zipperhead is one of three boutiques that Millan owns and operates in the South Street area — each of which caters to a slightly different section of the fashion market. Zipperhead, along with the other stores, XOG and Urban Gorilla, are among the most successful and long-lasting of the South Street boutiques.

Millan attributes Zipperhead's success to its ability to stay right on top of the trends. For the '90's generation, these trends are shaped by rock musicians and MTV, which are monitored daily by Millan and the Zipperhead staff. "Setting trends is second nature to the colorful staff that runs Zipperhead," explained Millan. "Nearly everyone connected with the store is involved with a band."

Another key to Millan's success is keeping an eye on what his customers want. The Ardmore Zipperhead is Millan's first suburban venture, so he will be looking for the differences in this market. Since most of Zipperhead's customers come from the suburbs and beyond, Millan suspects that the demand for certain standard items will be similar in the two stores.

Millan admits that the suburban Zipperhead's punk influence is a bit toned down compared to the South Street stores. But the store retains plenty of unique fashions like metal-studded bracelets and Doc Martins. Millan encourages all to "start out the new semester by trying to unzip the Zipperhead in you."

Book targets modern issues

completed work to publishing houses and he soon received rejections because the company did not handle textbooks or because the book was too long. In the summer of 1990 he sent his finished product to Loyola University Press, who said they were very interested in the book, but felt it was too long. The following winter Jackson revised his work and removed 22 percent of the content, making it acceptable to his new publishers. He signed a contract and saw the fruits of his labors two weeks ago when his book was published.

In his book Jackson defines peace and justice education as "a process whereby one learns to understand and accept the diversity of other people and cultures, develops a critically reflective sense of human experience based upon a humanitarian and Christian value system and appropriates strategies and techniques for effective social change." The book is divided into four sections which compose the previous definition; they are inclusion, perception, values and influence.

When asked about future plans, Jackson said he would like to develop a course on the environment. He has already started to collect material in this area and would like to take some time this summer to work on this new endeavor. He feels the development of a textbook in this area may coincide with the development of the course, as his first book did. He would not only focus on the degradation of the environment, but also on the ethics of why it is wrong and what we can do to change it.

William J. Byron, S.J., president of The Catholic University of America, wrote the foreword for Dignity and Solidarity. "This book is the product of the Augustinian restlessness-of-spirit of a sensitive human being who remains convinced of the value of education in the ongoing struggle to achieve a just and peaceful society," Byron stated in the foreword. Jackson encourages every student "to get involved in peace and justice."

been positive. She has been pleasantly surprised with the support from the Villanova community, which she feels has more respect for human life than other college campuses.

Although Haaf is pleased with the reception the group has had, she feels it still has a long way to go in becoming more active at Villanova. She hopes to achieve this by becoming more visible on campus. The group meets every Tuesday at 4:30 p.m. in the Center for Peace and Justice Education and anyone is welcome to attend the meetings.

Although there is not an organized pro-choice group on campus, Tiy Smith, a junior biology major and a pro-choice advocate, explained why she feels the rights of the living should take precedence over the rights of the unborn. "The display on the quad on the anniversary of Roe vs. Wade was intended, I believe, to send a high-intensity message to the Villanova community about the pro-life movement. I feel, however, that an important issue is being overlooked. I'm sure that there are women at Villanova who have had an abortion. It pains me to imagine what they must have felt as they walked through the quad. Regardless of the circumstances surrounding the procedure, must we at Villanova be so thoughtless, unsympathetic, unforgiving and/or self-righteous so as not to take their mental health into consideration? My pro-choice position is based on personal freedom. We pride ourselves on being a nation of free people, but are we really free if we do not have legal control of our own bodies?"

The law in Pennsylvania that anti-abortionists are attempting to pass would prohibit all abortions after the sixth month of pregnancy unless the life of the mother is in danger. It would require the notification of a parent, if the woman is a minor and/or that of the spouse. It would also require that a woman be completely informed of the procedure and any risks involved, and that the medical records be open to the public. The Supreme Court will hear the case in May, and render a verdict by July. If Roe vs. Wade is overturned, the decision on whether or not to keep abortion legal will be put back into the hands of the states.

that we get no respect at all … People think that we do nothing," said Bazemore.

By right of her contract, Bazemore was not allowed to discuss her income. She did say this, "You don't do it for the money. It's a good way to meet people and make connections. I must say that I think when I get out of Villanova, I'll have quite a few jobs set up for me just because of the people I've met."

The cheerleaders are required to make 10 charitable appearances a year. "It's almost like you get a chance to finally give something back. It makes you realize how fortunate you are. I never realized, until this year, how many homeless people there are … how many people don't eat … how many little kids are sick in a hospital," Bazemore said.

It is a written law that cheerleaders are not allowed to date the Eagles' players. Although Bazemore admitted that she has been approached by very prominent members of other teams, she said that it is taboo to date any players.

Bazemore was one of the rookies to receive her own mug shot in the Eagles' calendar. As a result of this calendar and of the prestige that comes along with being an Eagles' cheerleader, Bazemore has many devoted fans. She admits that sometimes the frenzy of these fans moves from the flattering to the annoying.

"You have to be very dedicated. You have to want to work hard. You have to be able to get along with people. They'll want your signature and you have to be really patient," Bazemore said.

Being a sophomore in college, Bazemore is the youngest on the squad. Most of the women are between 23 and 26 — the oldest being 30. Some are married and some even have children. The women have to try out every year and positions are not guaranteed. Right now, there is one woman who has been on the squad for eight years.

Bazemore took last semester off, realizing that cheerleading and a full course load was impossible. Her parents have been very supportive of her though, Bazemore said. "My mom is my best friend. If it hadn't been for her, I don't know how I would have lasted through the cheerleading season," she said.

While the cheerleaders only cheer at home games, exhibition games have taken Bazemore as far away as London, England. A true celebrity there, she partied with the likes of William Baldwin at the ambassador's mansion.

The cheerleaders also obtain many jobs such as store promotions and openings, modeling and car shows. "Our coaches will come in at the beginning of practice with a list of jobs. We all get out our calendars. Some of the jobs pay really well," Bazemore said.

Unsure of whether or not she will be at the "cattle call" to try out again in May, Bazemore does not regret a minute of her year as an Eagles' cheerleader. She is currently taking 12 credits this semester at Villanova, against the advice of Bill Cosby, whom Bazemore had the opportunity to meet. According to Bazemore, Cosby told her to "take the Temple challenge and get out of the other school."

Polis and Uses set unique style

ings. The opinions of each member are considered but they often "even choose things we don't like sometimes for variety," said one Uses editor, Jennifer Ehlers.

"The fun thing about working on Uses is that it gave me an opportunity to sit around and talk about poetry with other people who appreciate it," said the previous Uses editor, Catherine Tramantana.

In much the same manner, the Polis staff gets together and discusses the works after first blocking out the names of the authors and artists to avoid bias. The staff discusses each piece and chooses those which project a good reaction and work well for the magazine.

"I like reading and talking about the poems and other works because you get to see what is out there. Villanova doesn't usually herald this, but there is so much tremendous work out there. Also, a lot of faculty staff members submit things and it is exciting to see their work," said Knab.

Although similar in content, the magazines believe their form and style to be different. With this in mind, it is hard to avoid comparison, but both magazines are trying to avoid any dispute or clashing competition.

"I don't want to be a rival and I don't like to compare Polis to Uses, but Uses generally lets the works speak for themselves while the Polis technique is to make the magazine more than just a collection of individual works. Polis also tries to come together as a whole with its own substance and character," said Knab.

"We don't want to compete, we just want to put out our magazine, and I think there is room for both magazines on campus," said Ehlers.

Both magazines would like to publish as soon as possible after deadlines. Distribution time is projected to fall during the reading days which precede final exams.

Please Give Blood

Dear Villanova Student:

Your University and the American Red Cross have joined together to save lives. We need your help!

Each time you give blood, your donation gets broken into three parts (plasma, red cells, and platelets), so three (3) patients benefit.

If you have never given blood, here are some tips:

— Drink plenty of fluids the day before and the day of your donation.
— Make sure you have eaten on the day of your donation — don't eat right before you donate, though, wait about 45 minutes.

Please come to the blood drive. We need your help!

C&C Music dominates Awards

By MAURA RURAK
Editorial Assistant

The 19th annual "American Music Awards" special was broadcast live on Monday, Jan. 27 from the Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles. Hosting the show was rap superstar Hammer who also added to the special by performing a medley of his favorite tracks including, "2 Legit 2 Quit." Unfortunately, Hammer's actual rap was upstaged by his extreme dance moves and exploding light show.

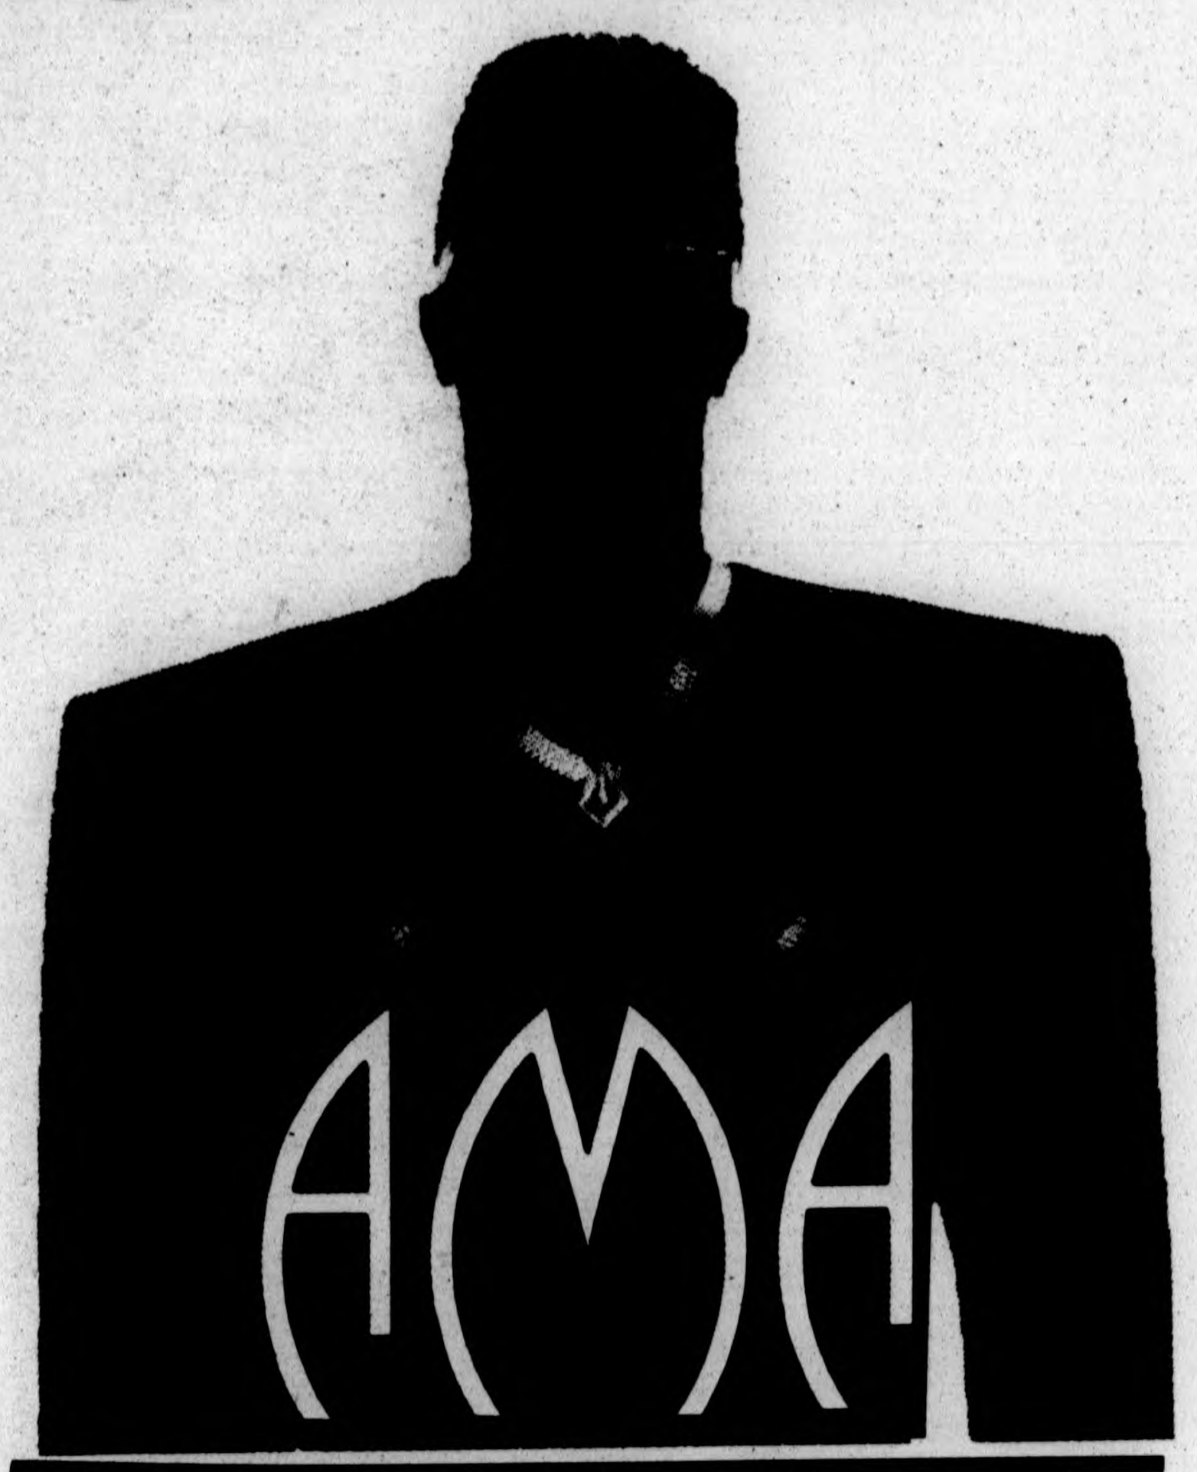
For this award show, the music industry is divided into seven sections including pop/rock, soul/rythmn and blues, country, heavy metal/hard rock, rap, dance music and adult contemporary. However, it is hard to place any importance on the winner when acts such as C&C Music Factory, Color Me Badd, and Guns N' Roses are grouped together in the pop/rock category, especially when C&C Music Factory wins. Regardless of talent or credibility, it was C&C Music Factory that dominated the Music Awards, taking home best dance artist, favorite dance single and best pop/rock group. It is obvious that the industry views this show as a prelude to the more widely recognized Grammys. "Being as the Grammys are coming up ... we thought it was important to make it clear we're not a lip-sync group," said C&C's David Cole.

Hammer's rap was upstaged by his extreme dance moves.

A special "Award of Merit" was presented to the "Godfather of Soul," James Brown, for his "outstanding contributions over a long period of time to the musical entertainment of the American public."

The always-graceful Natalie Cole took home two awards with favorite adult contemporary artist and favorite adult contemporary album, "Unforgettable." Garth Brooks swept the country category with best country single, best country album, and favorite single, "I Wanna Sex You Up" and Paula Abdul, who was seen holding hands with actor Emilio Estevez in the audience, brought home favorite pop/rock female.

The American Music Awards seem to be more of a media spectacle than a true awards show dedicated to recognizing talented artists. Winners were picked by a nationwide sampling of 16,000-20,000 record buyers. Therefore, the general focus was on the quick hits of image-conscious groups that may not have the stamina to pull through and someday win their own "Award of Merit."



Live combines clashing styles of music

By MAURA RURAK
Editorial Assistant

The new alternative band, Live, needs to decide which musical path they wish to follow before releasing an entire album. Their first effort, Mental Jewelry, seems to be a poor combination of folk-rock and heavy metal. The general rythmns and harmonies appear to be quite similar to that of popular mainstream bands which only unravels the Live's credibility.

The one outstanding feature of Mental Jewelry is the thought-provoking lyrics that contrast the dull sounds. All the songs on the album were written by the members of the band and their concern about the state of the world is quite apparent. "What do you say to the child whose God is in the T.V.?/And what do you say to the man who blames the world on T.V.? ... Free my son." (Waterboy) Live also seems to find some relationship between the outside world to one's own inner conflict: From "Take My Anthem," "War in me, War overseas, There ain't no difference between."

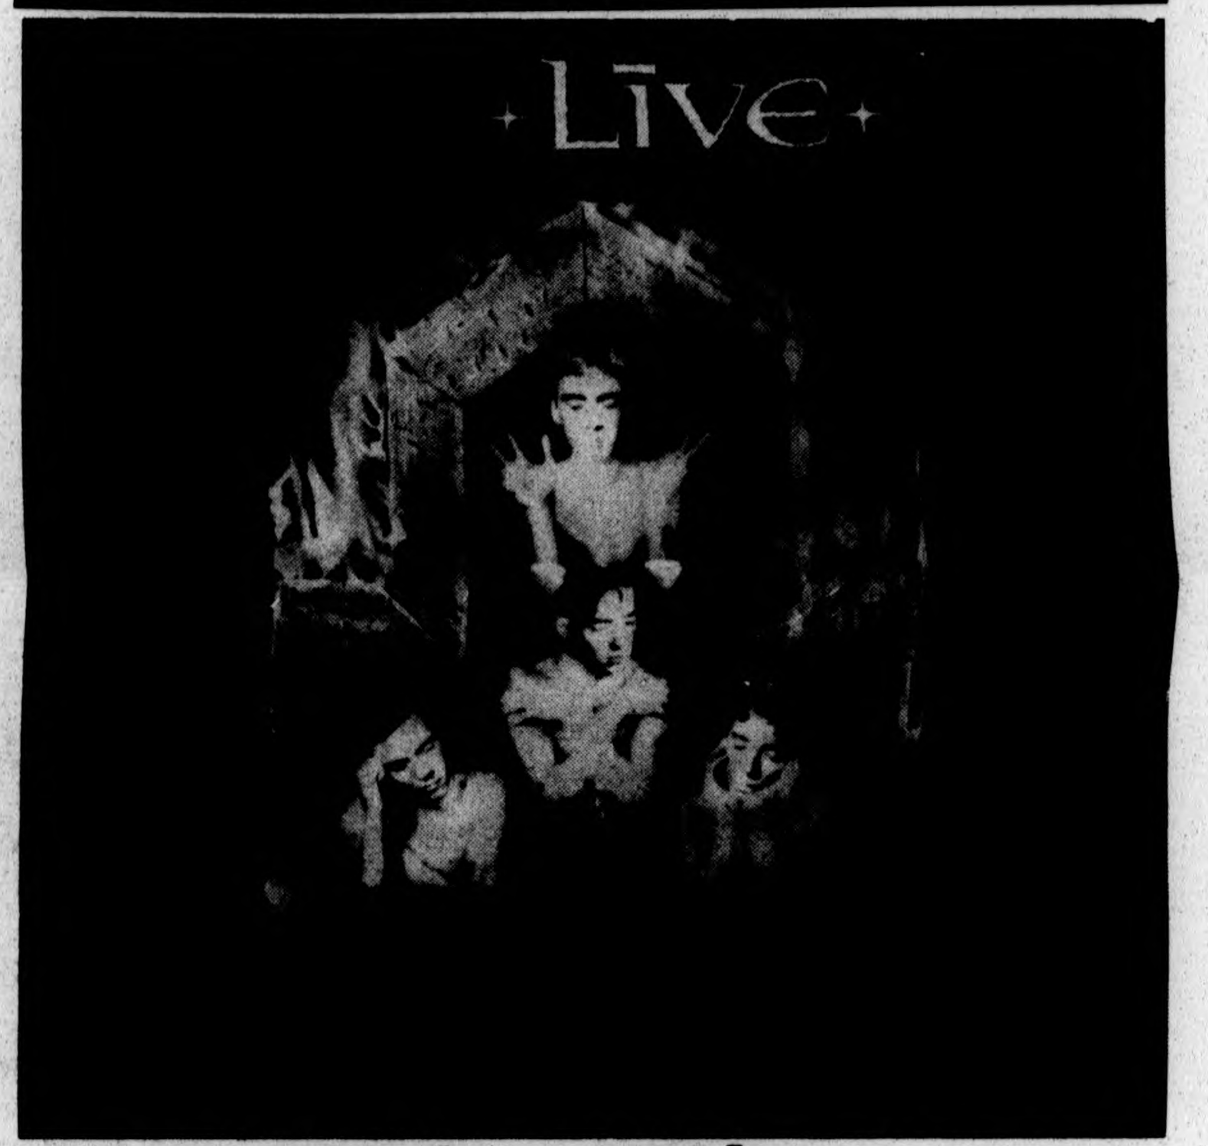
Live is a four-member band that originated in nearby Lancaster, Pa. The primary sound consists of guitars both acoustic and electric. Unfortunately, these young men have not tapped into their obvious potential. They choose to stick to the basic, which results in boring, run-of-the-mill tracks that are far from extraordinary.

Live has experienced a fair amount of airplay on MTV and is likely to fall into the marketing trap of being able to cross all musical boundaries without directly fitting into one specific category. A strong band with plenty of potential, Live has been unable to explore its own musical territories, yet through their lyrics they are able to break free from the constant love-hate-love theme.

Mental Jewelry is a valiant first effort by a band that needs to find its own identity. Perhapsthe band has fallen into the pit of fast success and quick money without realizing that it is selling itself short. The clear, smooth tones of lead singer Edward Kowalczyk's voice, however, is enough to indicate that Live can someday break through and establish its own unique sound.



Astbury's Cult captures new spirituality

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Cult lead singer Ian Astbury gives personal glimpse at this alternative rock band.

Ian Astbury of the Cult spoke to David J. Criblez in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Love. Electric. Sonic Temple. Ceremony. These four statements reflect various emotions and instincts derived from two people. Singer Ian Astbury and guitarist Billy Duffy are the chosen ones and their personal spirit lives within these four pieces of work. They are the Cult. They are the flesh and blood of English rock with a twist of punk inside. Ceremony is the most recent installment in their nine-year history. Their mystique is like no other and their vision is pure. Commercialism is what they loathe, while individualism is what they seek.

VILLANOVAN: Originally the Cult was a band of four and it has now come down to you and Billy. What caused this reduction?

ASTBURY: "The recession (he cackles) ... Actually the Cult is still very much a band in the sense that you need four musicians to play the music we write. A band only ceases when its heart is missing. Billy and I are that heart. If we were to go our separate ways, it would no longer exist."

V: Charlie Drayton and Mikey Curry fill the void of bass and drums on Ceremony; are they merely for the studio or will they appear live with you?

A: "I brought in Charlie and Mikey just to do some session work. They have other commitments. Now we have Kenny Wolf (bass) and Michael Lee (drums) as permanent members."

V: Were you upset about losing Matt Sorum (former Cult drummer) to Guns N'Roses?

A: "It hurt because he is a friend. Guns N'Roses were basically rubbing our noses in it, really. They obviously don't have great respect for us or anyone else for that matter, although I am still a great admirer of their music."

V: Originally you came from the Southern Death Cult, what was your focus in that band?

A: "That was my band. We were just a group of punk English kids in my basement at the time. I was just 18 years old. It lasted a year and a half and was pretty awful at that. "Spirit Walker" was the only thing that really came out of it that was a hit. But that material evolved into our first English release, Dreamtime."

V: Love was your first American release and it had a different feel than your later works. How would you attribute this?

A: "It was very experimental ... sheer experimentation."

V: Electric broke you through with a heavy rock sound that has now become your signature style. What made you turn up the volume at this time?

A: "It was always there. The producer of the Love album was the same guy who produced the Wham! Fantastic album. In 1984 there were no guitar-based producers in England at all. We came from a working class, so we took what we could get. So we ended up making a retarded LP, in a sense. A lot of people like that album but ... it could have been more."

V: The writing on Electric was centered around sheer straight ahead guitar riffs. Did producer Rick Rubin help cultivate that style?

A: "Yeah, definitely. I heard the Beastie Boys single, "She's On It," which he did and I loved that powerful dry sound. I thought we could strip it down a bit. Rick is an incredible man. He had so many ideas upfront. He said, 'We got to define what you're all about. This is it — BANG!' We put a lot of work into that album and I love it very much."

V: Many people were making a strong comparison between the Cult and AC/DC during the time of Electric. What was your reaction to that?

A: "AC/DC has a big rhythm section sound. We used a similar sound on Electric. I can see the comparison. The Rolling Stones also use this technique quite often ... although no one picked up on that comparison. The rhythm guitar is so important."

V: Your lyrics are rather unique in the sense that they are geared toward spirituality rather than taking the traditional rock-n-roll route. How are they inspired?

A: "They are based on my experiences. Although, if you look at all the albums, I remain quite consistent. Some of the lyrics out now are hideous. (Imitating a standard lyric) 'I'm riding down the highway doing 90 with my woman sniffing coke ... ' That's b.s. We can all get wasted, it doesn't take talent."

V: Producer Bob Rock did your third album, Sonic Temple. His work is rather commercial (Bon Jovi, David Lee Roth). What was his approach? How did he fit into the Cult?

Reed reflects on traumatic experiences

By JOHN KAZMIERCZAK
Staff Reporter

Inspired by the loss of two close friends to cancer, Lou Reed's new album Magic and Loss chronicles Reed's passage through this traumatic period in his life. Structured as a concept album, each song is subtitled. The subtitles allude to Reed's progression from his initial anger at the news of his friends' impending death, to the funeral and then onward to his final acceptance of humanity's mortality.

The main drawback concerning this album is that, despite a few fast-moving tracks such as "Power and Glory II" and "Warrior King," 14 songs concerning the nature of mortality make for a decidedly depressing, albeit thought-provoking, album. Reed's lyrics are performed in his signature style of an odd synthesis of singing and abstract. A listener who is not familiar with the underlying theme of the album will probably be left in the dark.

Reed's lyrics are performed in his signature style.

Typical of his latest efforts, Reed is backed only by a guitar, bass and drum combination. Stylistically, Magic and Loss is extremely diverse, ranging from powerful instrumental pieces, such as "Dorita," which showcases both electric guitar and percussion, to upbeat blues, to simple acoustic guitar accompaniment.

Longtime fans of Lou Reed and Velvet Underground, for which Reed was lead singer, songwriter and guitarist, will probably not be disappointed with his latest offering. Listeners who are not so familiar with Reed's unique style, however, are likely to listen to this soon-tedious album, shake their heads and wonder if they can get a refund.

Stones captured larger than life on IMAX

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

A documentation of the Rolling Stones' 1989-1990 Steel Wheels/Urban Jungle world tour, "At the Max" (Imax Films) surpasses the mundane concert films of the past in all respects. Filmed in Imax, a new form of filmmaking presented by concept designers Michael Cohl and Andre Picard, "Max" acts as more of an amusement park ride rather than a movie.

With the 85 x 54 foot screen at hand, the Stones can live up to its larger-than-life persona, hence the film's sub-headline "Larger than Live." The purpose of this tremendous screen production. which uses film 10 times larger than the standard 35mm, is to not only see a Stones performance, but to live it.

The familiar Steel Wheels concert set list remained but was chopped to 90 minutes due to the full three-hour length of the concert. Stones classics "Start Me Up," "Honky Tonk Women," "It's Only Rock-n-Roll," "Brown Sugar," "You Can't Always Get What You Want," "Tumblin' Dice," "Sympathy For the Devil" and "Satisfaction" were performed. However, long time favorites "Miss You" and "Jumping Jack Flash" and newer hits "Harlem Shuffle," "Undercover of the Night" and "Mixed Emotions," although in the concert set, were surprisingly nixed.

"Max" acts as more of an amusement park ride rather than a movie.

One of the most striking elements about the Steel Wheels tour was the reviving of older Stones material that had been left untouched during previous tours. "Paint it Black," "Ruby Tuesday" and "2000 Light Years From Home" were just a handful of old favorites that were performed. They are also a large portion of the success achieved through "At the Max," which seemed simply too big to be captured on Flashpoint, Stones' last and lacking live recording.

Even the whole atmosphere accompanying the performance evokes a concert with every detail stitched in. From the T-shirt booths and actual-size concert tickets to assigned seating, to an abrupt, unnecessary intermission was projected in a concert hall, the Beacon Theater (playing to Feb. 2), authenticity is reached.

Location director Julien Temple makes such maximum use of the wide screen that his camera angles steal the show. The clarity of the vibrant colors from the costumes, to the lighting, to blow up gargantuan figures makes it a more lavish production. Plus, it allows you to count each and every wrinkle on the Stones' faces.

'Dolls' hits stage

By MARY GRACE BONTEMPO
Staff Reporter

One of the most spectacular and entertaining musical events to hit this area in quite some time is coming soon to a theater near you. The Villanova Student Musical Theatre will present its production of the '40s hit musical "Guys and Dolls" Feb. 6, 7 and 8.

Auditions were held one evening in early December, bringing forth a variety of student talents, some old and some new, all of whom hoped for a spot in the cast of "Guys and Dolls." Shortly after finals, the ultimate decisions were made and the enthusiastic cast was assembled. With the dates of the show looming in the near future, the cast returned from Christmas break excited and ready to jump right into the hard but enjoyable work that lay ahead of them.

Now with opening night less than a week away, things are really moving. Final touches are being made on scenes and songs, and the dance sequences of the crapshooters and Hot Box Dancers are being polished to perfection. All the pieces are fitting together and are pointing to the makings of one fantastic and entertaining show.

Final touches are being made on scenes and songs.

In addition to hard work and dedication from the cast members, the creativity, knowledge and expertise of the production team prove essential for a successful show. Beth Dannenfelser, who directed last year's production of "Grease," returns as director this year. All of the dances are choreographed by Lauren Kerstetter, an alumna and former Musical Theatre board member. Lastly, sophomore Honors Major Eileen Harris serves as stage manager.

The performances will be held at the Haverford School's Centennial Hall. Tickets will be sold in the Connelly Center and at the door. Buy tickets ahead of time since sellouts are expected.

'Juice' provides drama

By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

Since the early '80s, African-American film directors have been creating powerful statements of what it means to be an urban black in the war zone known as the "inner city." Films like "Boyz N the Hood" and "Straight Out of Brooklyn" dramatize the lure of violence for street-wise youths, while also capturing its senselessness. Director Ernest R. Dickerson's "Juice" is another such attempt to portray the mean streets of Harlem in riveting, up-to-the-minute drama.

Dickerson, formerly the cinematographer in all the Spike Lee films, documents the wanderings of one "crew" of four ghetto tough guys as they patrol their turf. Behind each boy's veneer of street toughness lies a core of dreams and goals, none of which they talk about to their friends. Furiously guarded is an image of macho pride and invulnerability, which often provides their only protection from their violent world.

Q (Omar Epps) is the film's pretty boy hero who has the best chance for survival in the urban jungle. He has a talent for "mixing" rap records with his own slick DJ style, and performs well at the local Mixxmaster Massacre contest. His crew has planned a hold-up for that night, and between sets the crew pulls off the crime. Bishop (Tupac Shakar) holds the gun and then casually shoots the owner of the store in cold blood. The urge for power, for ruling over something, is the ultimate high in the ghetto.

Life in Harlem for these boys is a struggle for control. "Juice" is city slang for that surge of adrenaline and the temporary domination that follows an act of violence. This sense of potency defines morality in the inner city. Ironically, in most similar urban settings like Harlem in "Juice," however, these kids never attain the control they so desire.

Dickerson's modern morality play is filmed effectively as a clear portrait of the urban black paradox — black on black crime. While the film's central theme is anti-violent, it takes a hard look at growing up in the ghetto, offering nothing but the painful truth. "Juice" hits home with force and devastation.

"Love Crimes" features Patrick Bergin as a predatory photographer who victimizes the women he uses as models. Sean Young plays an ambitious assistant D.A. who goes undercover to gather evidence on Bergin's abusive patterns. By planting herself close to Bergin, she also hopes to find what causes his behavior. Danger soon emerges as she becomes more and more entangled in his nasty web.

The intended drama that the film intends never materializes. The premises of desire and domination seem as cheap and tawdry as the women Bergin photographs. Bergin's role is so similar to his character in "Sleeping With the Enemy" that it seems to be a mere rehash. The suspense is too weak to qualify the film as a thriller, and its lack of insight leaves it without psychological impact. That leaves "Love Crimes" as an average film that muddles its way through a tired plot.

FAST-FORWARD: Joe Pesci is a man on the move. Since his success in "Goodfellas" and more recently in "JFK," he has not slowed the pace. Scheduled as his next effort is "The Public Eye," where Pesci is a tabloid photographer in a role that seems tailor-made for his style. Set in Cincinnati, "The Public Eye" also stars Barbara Hershey as Pesci's love interest.

Gerard Depardieu will be discovering America in the upcoming "Christopher Columbus." The movie has a twist though — it will be told from the point of view of his illegitimate son, who is trying to restore his father's fallen reputation. "Christopher Columbus" opens in the fall.

REWIND: Two box office bombs, Mel Brooks' "Life Stinks" and Disney's "The Rocketeer" debut on video shelves, trying to recover from their poor showings. Neither should fare particularly well, although "The Rocketeer" might find a niche in the family section. The real gem of the current video releases is "Thelma & Louise."

CLIPS: Showing as part of Villanova's cultural film series is "Metropolitan," a recent (1990) release which "dissects life, honor and the impending demise" of New York's high society and the "downwardly mobile." It will show at the Connelly Center Cinema on Feb. 1 at 7 p.m., Feb. 2 at 3:30 and 7 p.m., and Feb. 3 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $2 for students.

Genesis plays it safe

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

ROCK QUARRY

Genesis is comfortable. All too comfortable for that matter. Releasing LPs four years at a clip, continuing their successful solo careers and living in the limelight is their ticket. To guitarist Mike Rutherford, keyboardist Tony Banks and vocalist/drummer Phil Collins, Genesis is homebase. Although home is where the heart is, it is rather difficult to find where the heart of Genesis has gone.

We Can't Dance is merely a safety net. It appears that the edgey tightrope that Genesis once walked has been worn as it steps down to commercialism. Songs like "Living Forever," "Driving the Last Spike" and "Since I Lost You" are too close for their own comfort. They lie flat and are far too slow paced.

As always there must be hits. The last Genesis LP, Invisible Touch, although blatently commercial, had a fair amount of diverse melodies. "Never a Time," "Jesus He Knows Me" and the first single, "No Son of Mine," are in fact applicable. They have the standard hooks but they are not as strong and clear as Touch's "Tonight, Tonight, Tonight," "In Too Deep" and "Land of Confusion." They are not stale but rather plain in nature.

Two steps are taken in the right direction. "I Can't Dance" and "Dreaming While You Sleep" continue that quick witted snap for which Genesis is known. Here its own sound rises above mediocrity and into originality.

Social commentaries that Collins addressed on his last studio solo effort, . . . But Seriously, arise here where they do not belong. "Way of the World" and "Tell Me Why" act as the bastard children of "Another Day in Paradise." It appears that Collins' solo work and Genesis are all becoming a big blur with a lot of talent and little direction.

Eric Clapton cannot stop working. After finishing his last studio solo album, Journeyman, he toured the world only to put together a follow-up double CD, 24 Nights, documenting his dates at London's Royal Albert Hall. Soon after the release of 24 Nights, Clapton rode shotgun to ex-Beatle George Harrison playing guitar in his band on a tour of Japan. Now with the movie "Rush" playing in theaters across the country, Clapton is at it again with a new film score.

"Lethal Weapon" films one and two were laced with Clapton's bluesy touch to create an intense mood. It was Clapton's guitar that highlighted those emotions. His work on Rush is a bit more low key. Instead of heightening the mood, Clapton tends to flow with it.

Each instrumental segway that Clapton lays down is quick and similar to each other. Just by listening to the album and reading the song titles such as "New Recruit," "Realization" and "Cold Turkey" it is easy to decipher the films scene set-ups. However, once taken out of the film's context, it seems Clapton's licks fall into a lull of shaded grey.

The last three tracks, also the LP's only vocal pieces, surpass anything Clapton has done in the last five years. Each song stands individually and without fault. "Help Me Up" draws between the blues and soul and a hint of pop. Meanwhile a gentle simplistic ballad, "Tears in Heaven," an ode to Clapton's recently deceased son Connor, reflects Clapton's pain and loss with sheer grace. "Don't Know Which Way to Go" features Buddy Guy on vocals and guitar as he battles it out with Clapton in a near 11-minute blues jam that smokes.

The band assembled for this album runs parallel with Clapton's touring band: keyboards, Randy Kerber and Greg Phillinganes; piano/organ, Chuck Leavell; bass, Tim Drummond and Nathan East; drums, Steve Ferrone; percussion, Lenny Castro; and synthesizer, Robbie Kondor.

Clapton is not a fossil like some of his contemporaries. He continues to further his talent pushing himself to new extremities. If the last three songs on Rush are any indication of Clapton's future writing, the best is yet to come.

SINGLE SPOTLIGHT: "Slippin' " by Kid N'Play is one of the year's best rap cuts. Dealing with the topic of drug destruction, "Slippin' " shows a more serious side to the house party duo as they effectively sample Steve Miller's "Fly Like an Eagle."

PEBBLES: New Jersey's favorite son, Bruce Springsteen, has announced the release of two LPs, Human Touch and Lucky Town. The albums are due in late March/early April and will hit the racks simultaneously. However, both are said to be unique. Touch has 14 songs while Town has 10. A tour is slated for this summer.

Dennis Miller hits late night ratings race

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"I have to tell ya . . . I'm wacked out on Prozac tonight," proclaims comedian Dennis Miller. The quick-witted comic who spews out vocabulary words faster than a Stanley Kaplan SAT course has entered the late night talk show arena.

Miller, famed on "Saturday Night Live's 'Weekend Update,' admits that he is a "different breed of cat." His politically-based humor is delivered in a sarcastic manner. Within the first few minutes of his opening monologue President George Bush was caught at Miller's crossing: "Recently a nude painting of George Bush was released, discovering that the economy isn't the only thing that is sagging." He followed up with, "I'm sure Georgy and Babs are tunin' in for the premiere."

Even his mistakes were handled in a cool manner. "I haven't quite mastered that Carson/Houdini extricating myself from the bad joke trick," tagged Miller, "It's the first night . . . be gentle."

Letterman rip-offs were inevitable. His "Quickie Telegrams" echoed "Viewer Mail" from "Late Night," but proved to be amusing at any rate. "Dennis — Good luck! We loved you in those beer commercials. The Kennedys," read a quickie.

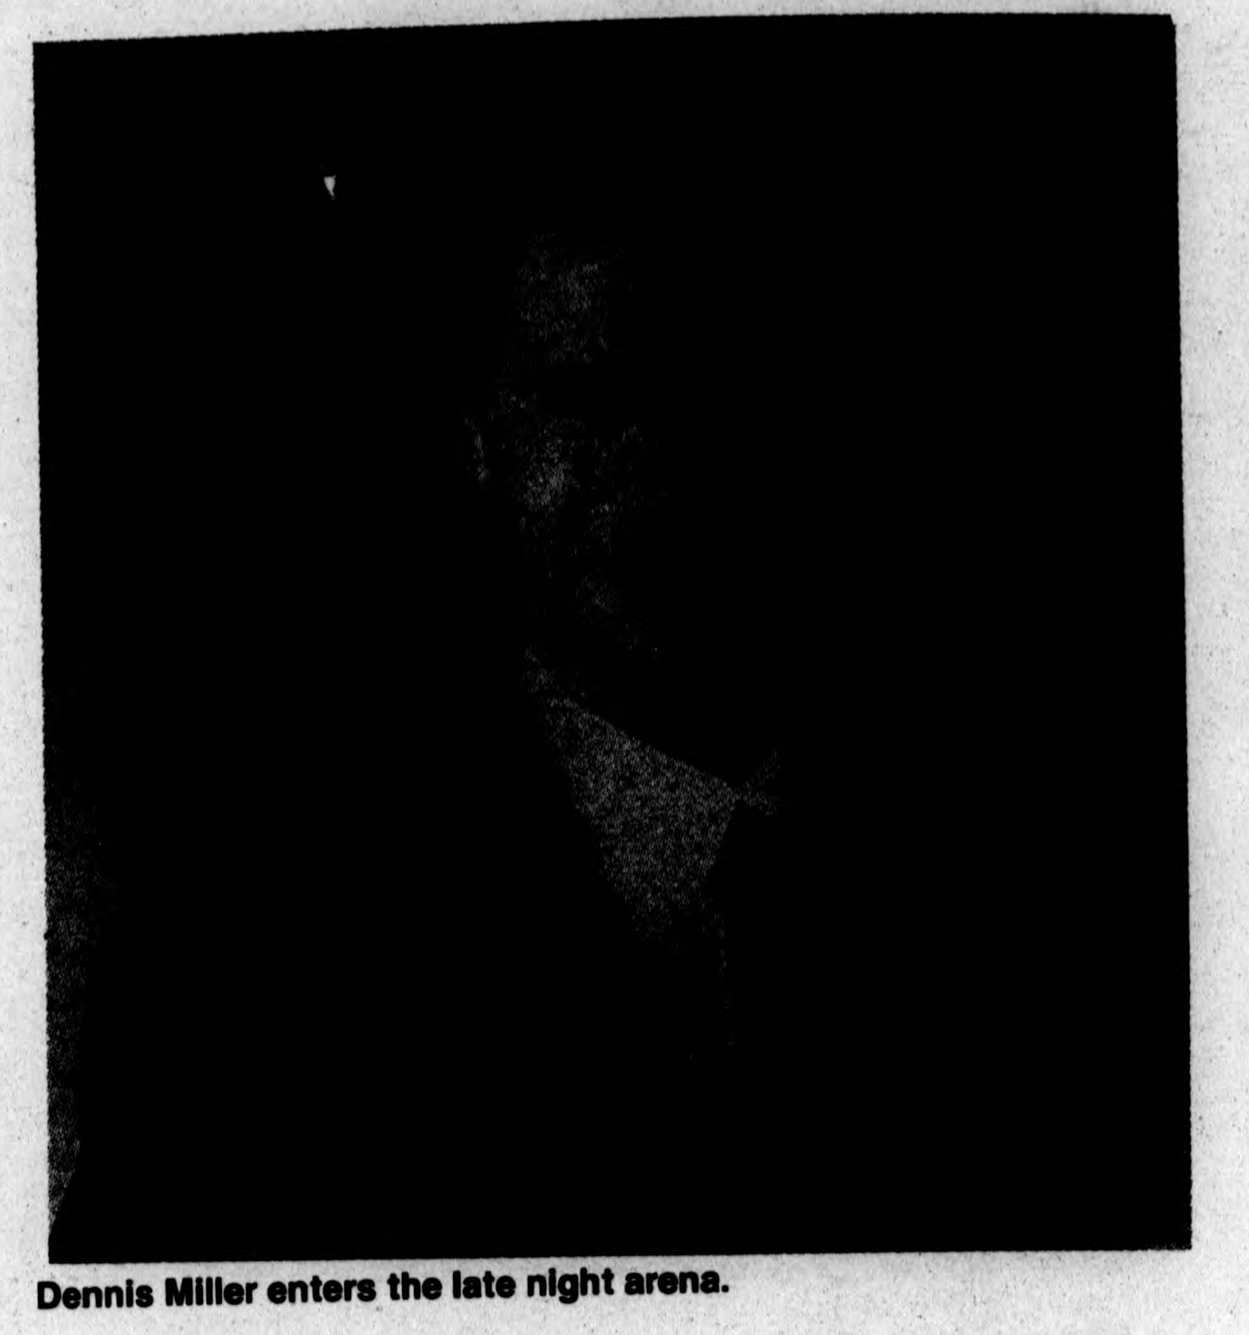
Even his mistakes were handled in a cool manner.

However, the physical up-front aspects of "The Dennis Miller Show" unfortunately fail to run parallel with its host's originality, with standard desk, guest chairs, home-city back drop and Carson-like curtain. Dealing with the run-of-the-mill house band, Miller has an edge. Instead of having a "thirtysomething" hipster banging on keyboards, former Police guitarist Andy Summers fills the void (Although Summers is a talent, it does not say much for his career).

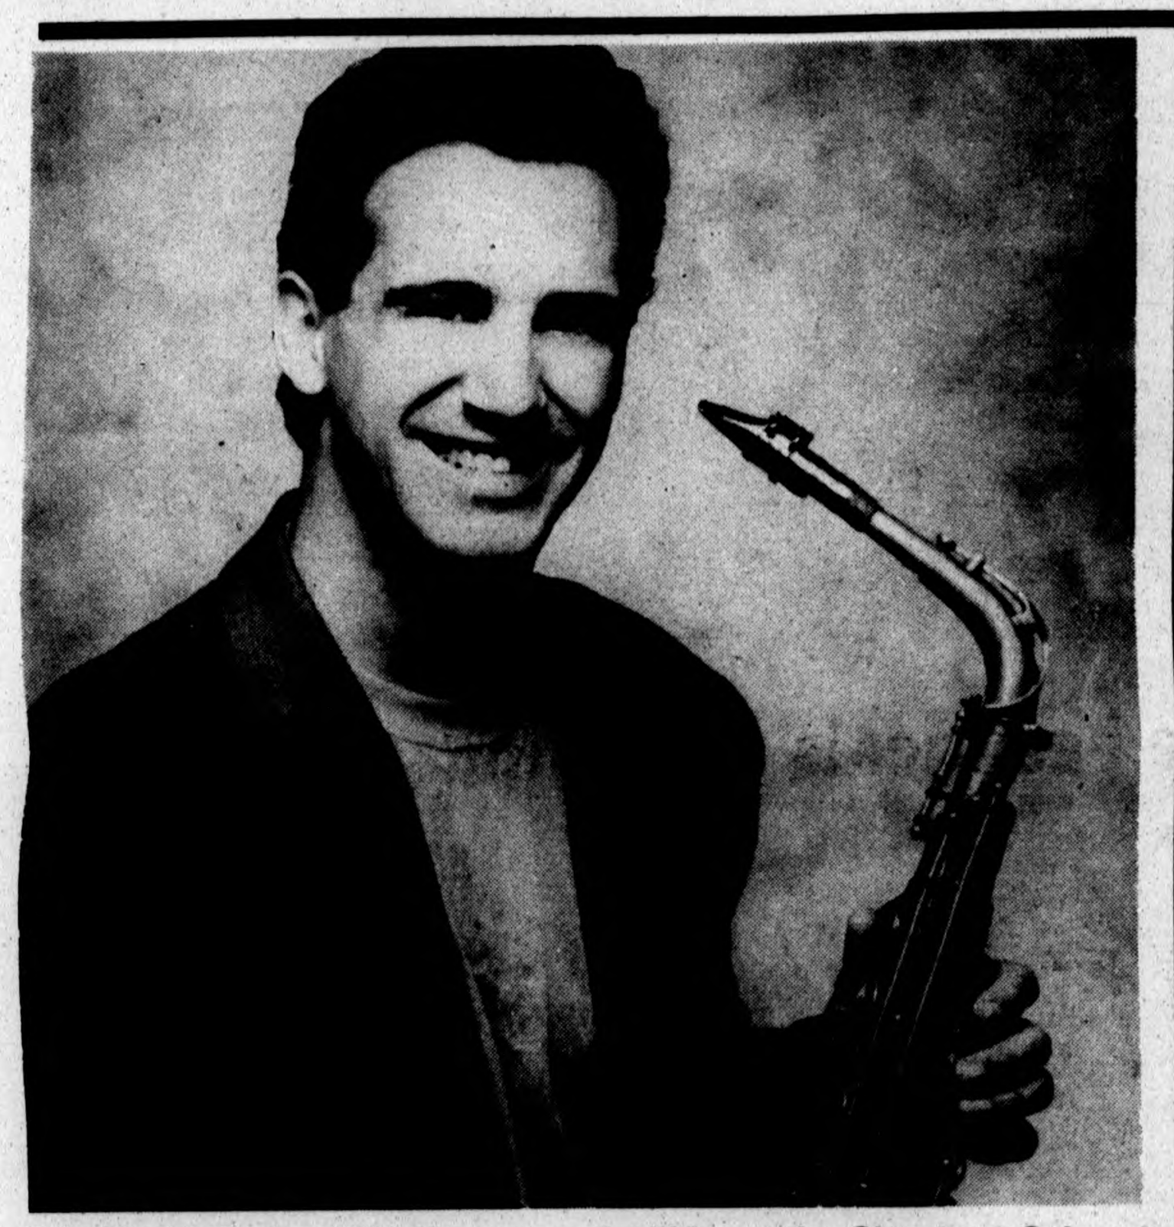
Tom Hanks, Bonnie Raitt and Christain Slater were featured on opening night. Hanks shined and played off his personal relationship with Miller that they established from Hanks' tenure as a five-time host on "SNL." Miller felt relaxed and thanked Hanks, "Thanks, Tom, for helping me break the ice. It's kind of like doing the first fast-dance at a wedding reception deal but you were there for me ridin' shotgun."

Raitt kept Miller in line as he tiptoed around the now mega-star who is Grammy bound (five nominations) again. He even let her wave a hello to her husband/actor Michael O'Keefe ("Caddyshack"), an overcongenial tactic expected from sophomoric Arsenio Hall. It was obvious Miller was too at ease from his time with Hanks and lost his balance.

Miller has what it takes as long as he uses his tools properly. He has the potential of recaptivating Letterman's old audience which has gone stale. "Hip" is what Dennis Miller is about, hip television is what Miller must create. He must nix the late night traditionalism and be himself.



Dennis Miller enters the late night arena.



Eric Marienthal and his jazz sound will be at the Chestnut Cabaret, Feb. 5.

'40s revival going strong

By V. KIELTY OBERLIN
Staff Reporter

If you are not yet interested in big bands, then get ready. American pop culture seems to be on the verge of yet another nostalgic revival.

The era that is reappearing is the swinging 1940s, in movies, television and even on Broadway.

We are a nation that thrives upon revivals. It is a known fact that history repeats itself, and social trends are effective of historical repetition. While the evidence of the '40s upsurgance may still appear trite, it is obvious that the seeds of renewal have definitely been planted.

The entertainment industry is a guaranteed source for showcasing America's cultural trends. For example, when the '60s revival showed promise, television reacted with shows such as "The Wonder Years" and Hollywood released "The Doors" and "Born on the Fourth of July." Now, we have the weekly airing of "Homefront" with characters and a setting all related to the 1940s.

Movies are yet another area of the industry that depicts social trends. Recently, movies such as "Bugsy" and "For the Boys" have hit the big screen. These films, like "Homefront," display the style and settings of the era.

We are a nation that thrives upon revivals.

So, what is it about the '40s that has attracted the attention and interest of our culture? Probably the most influential and obvious contributing factor for the revival was created by the Gulf War. World War II was the source for cultural uniqueness in the 1940s, and when the United States entered into the war of the Persian Gulf, inspiration was found in reminiscing. As the dangers of war stared our nation in the face, the heroes and heroines of yesterday were called upon to initiate hope.

Another aspect of the forties that corresponds to today and contributes to the present industry, also incurred for our nation a whopping war debt. Many parallels between present post-war situations can be drawn to that time almost 50 years ago.

Just how long this revival will last or how strong it will become, one cannot be certain. But, just to be safe, pop in a tape of Harry Connick, Jr. and catch a show of "Homefront." Or, better yet, buy a ticket to the Villanova Student Musical Theater's production of "Guys and Dolls" and see how the revival is catching on our own campus.

Doctors rock the Cabaret

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Hailing from New York City, the Spin Doctors are a band with an urban sound and a humorously offbeat attitude. Fresh from a four-month U.S. tour, the quartet will arrive at the 23 East Cabaret Feb. 6.

The Doctors' recent debut disc, Pocket Full of Kryptonite, supplies tunes with refreshing original lyrics which radiate rock with a modern edge. Songs such as "Two Princes," and "Jimmy Olsen's Blues," which cleverly maintains the Superman theme, celebrate the underdog. Peppered with blatant New York influences, this CD has been described by band members as "totally Bleecker Street." These songs are submerged in a Manhattan mood, covering all aspects from the glamour of Park Avenue in "Little Miss Can't be Wrong" to the gritty wild side of Hell's Kitchen in "Off My Line." The pinnacle of this city sound is "Shinbone Alley/Hard to Exist," a song which has also been done by Blues Traveler.

These songs are submerged in a Manhattan mood with all aspects from the glamour to the gritty wild side.

The Spin Doctors represent a blend of geographically eclectic musical backgrounds. Vocalist Chris Barron, the band's resident lyrical wizard, originated from Australia and spent the early years of his rock career on the Princeton, N.J., music scene which also produced Blues Traveler. At New York's New School of Jazz Barron joined forces with Toronto-born Eric Schenkman and Dallas native Aaron Comess, who play guitar and drums respectively. Mark White, a bass player from Queens, was added by Comess and the Spin Doctors began creating its funky hard-hitting brand of music.

The Spin Doctors perform at 23 East, Feb. 6.

The Doctors' first release, a live EP called Up For Grabs, established it as a band who effectively synthesize jam-rock beats with smooth, spirited lyrics. The band has continued to inject its sound with diversity on Pocket Full of Kryptonite, with guest appearances by Blues Traveler's harmonica player John Popper and New Bohemians' percussionist John Bush.

FLASH: Appearing at the Chestnut Cabaret Feb. 5, jazz saxophonist Eric Marienthal will be promoting his newest project, Oasis. Marienthal is a very experienced musician who has toured in recent years with Chick Corea's ensemble, Elektric Band, and with David Benoit. Also having recorded and performed live with Dave Grusin, Phil Perry, and Patti Austin, Marienthal displays his talent and versatility on Oasis. In his new material, which utilizes both his alto and soprano sax abilities, Marienthal indicates inspirations ranging from gospel and blues artists like B.B. King and Aretha Franklin to more modern musicians including Bruce Hornsby and Herbie Hancock.

A: "We were only his second project. Therefore, his commerciality came later. Bob's approach is much from a fan's point of view. He is a big fan of music. He is also a musician himself. He can pick up an instrument and physically play it and show you what he wants from you. He is a very fair and honest man. He is also a very important producer right now. With the new Metallica LP, his diversity has stretched that much farther. Plus, I wonder where he got some of his ideas for that LP.

V: The Cult possess a strong kick to its music — where does it come from?

A: "Most of that energy comes from our past experiences. We grew up differently than Americans. We lived in a very repressed environment. We were taught to be strong. That 'kick' is out of aggression from repression."

V: Earth tones seems to be the centerpiece of Ceremony. A naturalistic approach seems to have been taken, was this the motivation of the LP?

A: "If you look at any writing at any point in time in any genre . . . it will deal with natural elements. 'White' is about a search or quest. The piece of mind of a hunter and the ability of being one with yourself. We get heavy criticism 'cause it threatens people's perception of reality. It's very sensuous."

V: You have been compared to Jim Morrison many times. Do you see any similarities?

A: "We have similarities. We're both with Anglo-Saxon baritones who grew up around negative people. But to me Morrison failed. He died. To me real strength is to live a life. I don't identify with death. He killed himself, he stole his own life away. It's a crime. He was a great individual, he just didn't make it all the way."

V: You, as a person, seem to be rather tribal-minded. Do you practice rituals or follow any way of life?

A: "I think we all do. We tend to disassociate ourselves from Indians because we think they are primitive, backward. If you take a good look around, there is great similarity between us."

V: A quote dons the inner-sleeve of the Ceremony album, 'Earth, Soul and Rock-n-Roll.' Is this the band's creed?

A: "It's my creed. It was also originally the name of the album but, 'Ceremony' seemed better at the time."

V: What is the "Gathering of Tribes" festival that you put together?

A: "It was a reaction to the apathy going around in the music industry. A reaction against the lack of communication between artists. It's important to have choice and quality and to make music more exciting again. People need that physical communication in society or else the communities that make it up get fragmented."

V: How did it differ to the "Lollapolooza" music fest?

A: "It was a direct rip-off of 'Gathering of Tribes.' Basically, the promoter of the Lollapolooza wanted to promote 'GOT' but we already had a promoter at the time. He got all jealous so he went to Perry Farell with the idea and did it in America."

V: You are currently on tour with Lenny Kravitz. What have these past months involved on your circuit?

A: "We'll tour for another month and a half with Lenny. We already toured Europe and South America where we played to 45,000 people. It was great."

V: Explain the mysterious aura of the Cult. Where does it come from?

A: "It's from putting ourselves in situations that most people wouldn't put themselves into. We take the mystery of life and put it in our own terms. We come from between the lines and when no one's looking."

Swimmers move up in poll

By BOB TRAVISANO
Staff Reporter

The 'Nova swim team continues to cause a stir in the world of women's aquatics. This past weekend the Cats defeated Pittsburgh, the only team to win a women's Big East title. Presently ranked No. 21 in the coaches poll, the women are sure to move up after another undefeated week.

The trio of Eileen Consadine, Lisa Flood and Mary Dowling had its usual stellar outings, and Jerry O'Mara and Eddie Paradise kept it close for the men in a losing effort. Two freshmen that Head Coach Chuck Horton tabs as great surprises are Robert Drumm and Sean Kelliher. Also two juniors, Jim Fagan and Scott Fraser, have stepped up to assume leadership roles in practice by pushing their fellow teammates.

"The turning point in the season," said Horton, "came at the Princeton meet when the team came in with some top times and realized that they could compete at a national level. The team has a great base, one of the best that they've had since I've gotten here."

> The team has a great base, one of the best that they've had since I've gotten here.
> Head Coach Chuck Horton

The race for the Big East men's title looks to be a three-to-four team race among Syracuse, Miami and 'Nova. Miami is the only team in the Big East to be ranked nationally, at No. 24. There have also been a few surprises for the women in terms of step-up performances. Sarah Dykstra has become a national level swimmer, and Amy Burton keeps coming up with personal best times nearly every time she gets in the pool.

A sobering blow hit the swimming world this past weekend as a Notre Dame swim team bus tipped over, killing two girls and injurying several others. Many of the 'Nova swimmers knew these girls and were affected by the tragedy. In fact, the victims were actually recruited to come here.

"It's really sad. It makes you realize what life has to offer," said Horton. A moment of silence was observed at the Pitt meet in memory of the women.

On a more positive note, it looks as if the team has a great chance to swim competitively in championship meets this year.

"If we keep focused and keep our minds on our goals we should have no problems," said Horton.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

This week's the Villanovan Athlete of the Week is Salaam Gariba. The junior runner won the 55-meter sprint with a time of 6.17 seconds at the New England Invitational Jan. 25 in Boston. In the process, he broke his own school record of 6:18 set last year. Gariba is undefeated in the event this season and will compete in the NCAA Championships. He also will participate in the 1992 Summer Olympics.

"A school like Georgetown or Villanova will accept an athlete that scores an 810 to play basketball," said Packer. "That would be like me grabbing you and saying that you're playing this week against St. John's. You can no more play basketball than can a kid compete in the classroom on an even level with kids with an 1150 SAT. There is definitely a double standard."

DeLorenzo also sees athletes that are admitted with inferior scores as being rewarded unfairly. He thinks a student that works hard is being rewarded, but that someone who has not is also being rewarded, although not working nearly as hard.

> The problem is not with the coaches or athletic directors, but with the hierarchy of the NCAA.
> Billy Parker, CBS Sports

As for whether the SAT is culturally biased, the unanimous answer was yes.

"Without question," said Tranghese. "Based on all studies, you will find that they all state that they are culturally biased."

"The academic administrators are kidding themselve," said Packer. "I saw a popular circulized [sic] College Boards letter that stated that the SAT's are not at all to be reflective of college success."

DeLorenzo admits to there being some bias but says that "any test has bias, no matter what."

The proposition really has no bearing on Villanova, according to DeLorenzo. The University has never or will never admit any athlete that does not score a 700 on the SAT. The reason is that administrators believe anyone without a 700 has no chance of graduating from Villanova. Villanova has maintained this stance long before Prop. 48 came into effect in 1985, and the University has not changed.

"I am very comfortable with Villanova's decision because it is an academic decision," said Tranghese.

DeLorenzo, a Villanova graduate, agrees with the University's stance, saying that he does not want his degree undermined because he knows how much work it takes and he appreciates it. He also said that "just because you play a sport, or the tuba, or write very well, do you get a scholarship without meeting the academic requirements. It just doesn't happen."

Villanova has been both academically and athletically successful despite not admitting athletes with under a 700 score, while just about every other college does. DeLorenzo is not at all concerned with other schools that admit students who do not achieve the 700.

"It's up to that school, but I think when graduation rates are made public next year, it will catch up to them. And after they see that two players on their basketball team have graduated, they will change that policy," said DeLorenzo.

Statistics show that the number of Prop. 48 victims has decreased every year and that colleges are now thinking twice about admitting these students. More high school students are taking their grades seriously, and an increase in SAT scores is proof of this.

Presidents are in the process of making sweeping reforms on top of the ones already instituted, such as a decrease in the length of practice time for all sports, the reduction in the length of the college basketball season, and a lowering of football scholarships. All of this can be attributed to Prop. 48.

"The double standard exists and the administrators should just admit it. The problem is not with the coaches or athletic directors, but with the hierarchy of the NCAA," said Packer.

Fairfield ices Cats, 7-6

By JASON CARNEY
Staff Reporter

If the highflying hockey affair between Fairfield University and Villanova Jan. 25 is any indication of the Cats' games this season, Villanova students are missing out. Although Fairfield prevailed 7-6 in an exciting makeup with many lead changes, the crowd was treated to an action-packed contest. Villanova's offense was paced by one of the team's tri-captains, Hugh Maginnis. The senior netted a hat trick, yet it was not enough to get by the quick-striking Stags.

The '91-'92 season has been injury-plagued for the 'Nova squad. The IceCats have been beset with injuries to key players throughout the year. Most importantly, the loss of star defenseman Bill Fortescue and tri-captain Tom Dillon, has drastically affected the team's performance. 'Nova also lost its starting goalie and one of its most productive scorers in the last two years due to personal reasons.

However, first-year coach Pat Ferrill has molded together a hard working unit. Dillon describes his mates as a "fiery, spirited bunch, who have had to overcome a great deal of adversity." The Cats are led by league leading scorer Maginnis and tri-captan Ty Carmichael. Also, net-minder Jim McCarney is back from a semester abroad in Spain, helping to solidify 'Nova's net play. Moreover, the team is expected to receive a much needed boost with the return of Dillion, who has displayed true dedication in getting back into playing form.

Though time is running out for the IceCats to make the playoffs, the team is still confident that it can put a string of wins together and squeak into the post-season. Dillon sights the team's "close-knit camaraderie" as a big plus on and off the ice.

The Skatium, the Cats' home rink, is located in Havertown, only 10-15 minutes from Villanova's campus. Saturday and Sunday Villanova will entertain New Hampshire College, with games starting at 5 p.m. and 12 noon.

Gariba breaks record, men streak into NCAA's

By LARRY LANZA
Staff Reporter

Personal records came from every direction, and a few NCAA Championship qualifications with them, as the Villanova men's track team enjoyed its best meet this season at the New England Invitational Jan. 25 in Boston.

Leading the Cats were the performances of senior Finn Kelly and juniors Brad Sumner and Terrence Mahon, all of whom ran personal best times to provisionally qualify for the NCAA Championship. In addition, junior Salaam Gariba, who has already automatically qualified for the NCAA Championship, broke his own Villanova record in the 55-meter sprint.

Kelly's mark came in the form of a 4:02 time in the Commonwealth Mile. Almost exactly a year earlier in Boston, Kelly had set his previous personal mark when he ran a 4:03 race in the Terrier Classic Mile, a race in which he will again compete tomorrow. Kelly's run this past weekend earned him a third place finish, four seconds behind winner Andy Keith of Providence.

For Sumner, third in the 800 meters, there was a personal best indoor time of 1:50.04. Winning the race in 1:48.59 was Fred Williams of the Toronto Olympians club.

'Nova's third NCAA provisional qualifier came in the 3000 meters, where Mahon ran a personal best of 8:08 to finish seventh. Winning in 8:00 was marathoner Ken Martin of Nike International.

Competing in a second heat of the 3000 meters were senior Tim Pollis (third) and freshman Dave Hartman (sixth), each of whom provisionally qualified for the IC4A with respective times of 8:24 and 8:30.

"My race was evenly paced," said Pollis. "I was happy with what I did, and Terrence (Mahon) ran great."

Gariba was another Wildcat right on target in Boston. The sprinter dashed to a 6.19-second victory in the trials of the 55 meters and then bested it to win the finals in 6.17. In doing so, Gariba remained unbeaten in the event this season and, more importantly, eclipsed his own Villanova record of 6.18, which he had set a week earlier in the Florida Invitational.

The only other Wildcat competing individually on the track was sophomore Mike Going, who ran 2:25 in the 1000 meters to earn third. Taking the win in 2:24 was recent Villanova graduate Mike Seeger of the Boston Running Club.

"This was a change for me, coming down from the mile and running this faster event," said Going. "It was a little strange running against Mike (Seeger) without him being a teammate any longer."

> Personal records right across the board. What more could a coach want, what more could a coach say.
> Head Coach Marty Stern

In addition to the individual entries, Villanova also ran a pair of relay teams in the 4x800 meters. The all-freshman team of Kyle Watson, Louie Quintana, Chuck Silvester, and Ken Nason combined to finish third in 7:40, with Quintana and Nason both running 1:54 splits.

'Nova's second relay of senior Joe Sigey, freshman Andreas von Scheele, and sophomores Mike Shemonsky and Lou Kahl finished seventh in 7:52, with Sigey running 1:55.

"Our relay was a bit young and a little short on experience, but we hung in there," said Sigey. "The competition both of our relays faced was very tough."

In the distance medley relay, 'Nova was the strongest among the competition, posting a 9:56 to capture first. The relay featured the same all-freshman unit from the 4x800 meters. On the anchor mile, Quintana came through with a personal best of 4:06.

In the field events, senior Greg Mirecki competed in the shot put, recording a best throw of 50'0".

"What a day," said Head Coach Marty Stern. "Personal records right across the board. What more could a coach want, what more could a coach say."

This weekend the Wildcats return to Boston to compete in both the Terrier Classic and the Greater Boston Track Club Invitational.

Women set pace

By MIKE AGOLINO
Staff Reporter

The Villanova women's track and field team performed well once again this past weekend, competing at the New England Invitational held at Harvard University. The Cats had one automatic qualifier and three provisional qualifiers for the NCAA Indoor Track Championships to be held at Indianapolis in March.

Sophomore Carole Zajac earned Villanova's first automatic NCAA bid of the year, finishing third in the 3000 meter event. The event was won by former 'Nova star Gina Procaccio. Zajac's time of 9:15.92 was a personal best, beating previous record by almost 18 seconds.

In the mile, three Wildcat runners were also successful in capturing provisional bids for the NCAA Championships. Leading the way for Villanova was junior Nnenna Lynch, who finished in fifth place with a qualifying time of 4:44.909. Lynch finished fourth in the mile at the 1991 NCAA Championshipos. Also qualifying for the Cats was Kate Fonshell, who finished eighth with a time of 4:47.60, and Chris Gentile, who finished in tenth place with a time of 4:48.30. Former Villanova runner Sonia O'Sullivan finished first in the mile, with a time of 4:38.63.

In addition to the NCAA qualifiers, all of whom qualified for the ECAC Championships, junior Irene Ruopoli qualified for the ECAC's in the 800 meter event. Her qualifying time of 2:12.60 earned her a sixth-place finish.

Head Coach Marty Stern was pleased with the team's performance against the older competition. "These athletes performed very well in about the toughest competition you will find," said Stern. "We ran against professional runners who are older and more experienced and we really rose to the occasion with outstanding performances. This type of competition will toughen us up for later in the season."

This is to acknowledge BILL and LARRY'S victory over KRISTEN and CRICKET, regarding last semester's attendance at KELLY'S, just "one block this way, and one block that way."

Men's Week in Review

By JUSTIN KESTNER
Assistant Sports Editor

It was an eventful week in the Big East, as three different teams took turns occupying first place. Syracuse yielded the top position to Villanova before Connecticut finally nailed down the conference lead.

CONNECTICUT

The sixth-ranked Huskies (16-1, 7-1 Big East) found overtime to be twice as nice, defeating both Providence and B.C. in the extra session. UConn escaped with a 97-86 OT win over the host Friars Jan. 22 as Chris Smith scored 27 points and Scott Burrell added 25. Providence went without a field goal in the overtime period. Three days later, UConn pulled out an 83-77 come-from-behind win over B.C. Smith again was the star, scoring 14 of his 23 in the final 13 minutes of regulation and adding six more in overtime. Connecticut finished off a perfect 3-0 week by defeating Villanova 72-58 Jan. 27 to take over sole possession of first place.

SYRACUSE

The 12th-ranked Orangemen (14-2, 6-2) began the week with a 70-60 loss at Villanova. Leading scorer Dave Johnson was held to eight points on just two of 13 shooting from the field. Syracuse rebounded with a 58-56 victory over St. John's thanks to a superb effort from freshman sensation Lawrence Moten, who scored 20 points.

GEORGETOWN

The Hoyas (11-4, 4-2) registered a pair of victories as all-America center Alonzo Mourning led the way. The 6-foot-10 senior scored 19 points in a 63-59 triumph over host Pittsburgh Jan. 22. Mourning then dominated play against Miami, collecting 26 points, 11 rebounds and seven blocks in a 60-40 home victory.

ST. JOHN'S

The Redmen (10-6, 4-4) are fading fast. After going 0-2 on the week, St. John's has now lost three straight conference games and is not ranked for the first time all season. The Redmen were blown out by Seton Hall 75-60 at the Meadowlands Jan. 20. They lost to Syracuse 58-56 Jan. 25 and must now try to get back on the winning track before they forget the way.

PITTSBURGH

It was a tough week for the Panthers (11-8, 3-3). After dropping a close game at home to G'town, Pitt traveled to Arizona, where the ninth-ranked Wildcats ran away with a 96-76 win.

SETON HALL

After recording two impressive victories, the Pirates (11-5, 3-4) finally seem to be playing up to their potential. Terry Dehere erupted for 31 points, 23 in the first half, in the win over St. John's. The Hall then hosted Ohio State Jan. 26, where they pulled off a 68-64 upset of the 10th-ranked Buckeyes behind a career-high 16 points from sophomore John Leahy. Seton Hall is now ranked 23rd in the USA Today Poll but is unranked in the A.P. Poll.

BOSTON COLLEGE

It was nearly a tremendous week for the Eagles (11-6, 3-5). First, B.C. stole a 51-50 win from Miami on a 13-footer from Gerrod Abram that was still in the air as the buzzer sounded. It marked the third time this year Abram has nailed the decisive shot. In the process, B.C. extended its conference winning streak to three games, its first since 1985. But the Eagles could not keep their streak alive and fell to UConn in overtime in their following contest.

PROVIDENCE

The Friars (9-10, 1-6) recorded their first Big East win at the expense of Villanova behind the inside power of Marques Bragg and Michael Smith Jan. 26. Bragg scrapped for nine points and 10 rebounds while Smith added 13 points and six boards in the 63-55 win. This came on the heels of a valiant effort against UConn, who needed overtime to defeat the Friars. In the contest, sophomore Michael Smith established himself as a future star, scoring 13 points and ripping down 22 rebounds.

MIAMI

The long road continues for the Hurricanes (6-12, 1-7). The 'Canes dropped a heartbreaker to B.C. at home and then were whipped by Georgetown. But Miami is a young team with nothing to lose in its inaugural season in the Big East. (Just ask St. John's.) They might not win another conference game this season, but the Hurricanes will continue to give it a shot as they learn the style of the Big East. Expect Miami to improve a little by season's end, but not much more than that.

Women's Week in Review

By ALEX SCOFIELD
Staff Reporter

MIAMI

The Hurricanes continue to breeze through Big East competition. Miami is the only Big East team currently ranked in the women's Top 25, moving up two notches to the No. 12 spot in the nation. By the beginning of this week, they had notched 17 consecutive wins, the best current streak in women's basketball. Their league record is now a perfect 9-0.

GEORGETOWN

Following close at the heels of the Hurricanes are the Hoyas, who also have a perfect week in Big East competition. Behind the performance of Big East Player of the Week Kris Witfill, the Hoyas rolled over Boston College and Syracuse to up their conference record to 7-1. Though not one of the nation's Top 25 teams, G'town received a significant number of votes and are on the verge of breaking into the exclusive club.

PROVIDENCE

The Lady Friars were unable to improve their conference standings this week, maintaining a third-place tie in the Big East with Connecticut. Their high-scoring offensive attack could not overcome UConn, to whom Providence lost 89-61, but P.C. did muster up just enough points to overcome 'Nova in a thrilling 82-80 double-overtime victory.

SYRACUSE

Two consecutive losses stuck the Orangewomen with a 3-5 record by week's end. S.U. faced the unenviable task of playing the top two Big East teams, Miami and Georgetown, in their two most recent contests. Syracuse was unable to put up a fight against either team, losing 71-52 to the 'Canes and dropping the Georgetown game 80-61.

CONNECTICUT

One week ago, the Huskies appeared to be fading away from Big East contention after dropping to the .500 mark. However, a perfect week put UConn right back into the fray at the top of the league with lopsided victories over Providence and Pittsburgh. Despite the triumphant performance of the team, not all news is good for the Huskies. Rebecca Lobo, Connecticut's leading scorer, missed the Pitt contest and may miss more games due to a wrist injury.

PITTSBURGH

Although the Panthers recently seemed to be heading toward the league's first division last week, their two-game winning streak was brought to an abrupt halt when they collided with St. John's and Connecticut, losing both games.

ST. JOHN'S

Splitting their last two conference games, the Express wound up 3-5 at the end of the week. In a 70-51 win over Pitt, St. John's received strong offensive help in the form of double-doubles from Cozette Ballentine (15 pts., 13 rebounds) and Pam Odaom (15 pts., 10 rebounds).

SETON HALL

A dismal losing streak for the Lady Pirates finally came to a halt last Saturday when the Hall overcame Boston College 76-52. Before this win, Seton Hall had dropped six consecutive games, its most recent loss coming at the hands of 'Nova. The prognosis is not favorable for the Pirates, who have to play league powerhouses Providence and Miami on the road in their upcoming games.

BOSTON COLLEGE

The Eagles' loss to Seton Hall was their third in a row. Like the Hall, B.C.'s Big East record is now 2-6. Also, the Eagles face a bleak series of road games against a pair of fearsome conference opponents.

Basketball Preview

By PATRICK MEILER

The Villanova basketball team, after dropping two straight conference games on the road, stands at 7-9 overall, 5-3 in Big East play. Wins are desperately needed if the Cats are to entertain thoughts of receiving a bid to the NCAAs.

The Wildcats face the Temple University Owls in a Big 5 game tomorrow afternoon. The Owls enter the game with an 8-7 mark. Temple broke a three-game losing streak with an 83-61 drubbing of the UMass Minutemen Jan. 28. Temple has been a disappointment this year since Head Coach Chaney's patented match-up zone defense has been exploited with ease by opponents. Of course, the loss of the conference's best defender in Mark Macon has not helped. Temple is led by seniors Mik Kilgore and Mark Strickland. Villanova lost its last meeting with Temple last year at duPont Pavilion 70-57 when Kilgore led the Owls with 21 points. Senior Vic Carstarphen will battle Chris Walker at the point for the Owls. Two Prop. 48 players will start for Coach Chaney, Eddie Jones and 6-5 Aaron McKie. Look for McKie and Kilgore to head the scoring column.

The Wildcats have to get back to the fundamental play that has proven so successful in the past. The Cats must concentrate on blocking out on the defensive end for rebounds. Villanova has been outrebounded by 22 in its last two games. In addition, the Wildcats must limit turnovers, including charging violations. Field goal shooting has been particularly poor this season. The Cats are at the bottom of the league in this category, hovering right near the 40 percent mark. The Cats must finish off their fast break opportunities, as well as sink their layups. For Villanova to pick up a much needed quality out-of-conference win, the Cats must improve upon these areas, particularly rebounding.

The Cats then host always dangerous Georgetown, Feb. 4. Head Coach John Thompson's club has responded to the loss of its best guard, Charles Harrison, by winning conference matches against Pitt and Miami. Alonzo Mourning is the inside force for the Georgetown squad. He averages over 23 points and 12 rebounds per game. The main focus for the Cats will be Mourning, who dominated the lane in Georgetown's 75-73 loss to 'Nova in early January. A win would mark an impressive sweep of a team that Villanova has a hard time splitting with in the past. Joining Mourning for the Hoyas is talented swingman Robert Churchwell, while Joey Brown controls the point. Two freshmen, John Jacques and Irvin Church, will dot the starting lineup. For the Cats to win, they must make the Hoyas beat them from the perimeter. Harrison, their best shooter from beyond 15 feet, is gone so the younger guards have to prove their shooting abilities for the Hoyas to come up victorious. Georgetown plays pressure half-court defense; so, as always, the Cats must come up with quality shot opportunities.

Cats fall to Huskies, drop to 7-9

By ED WASIELEWSKI

Life on the road in the Big East is always tough. After winning five straight conference games, the men's basketball team has now dropped two away contests to Providence and sixth-ranked Connecticut. The Cats overall record now stands at 7-9, 5-3 in conference play.

'Nova traveled to Gampel Pavilion for a rematch with the UConn Huskies Jan. 27. In a typical Big East contest, the Huskies, who lost to 'Nova earlier in the year used defense and intense physical play to avenge their only loss of the season, 72-58. The Huskies, who own sole possession of first place in the Big East, used suffocating defensive pressure to force the Cats into 30 percent field goal shooting and 16 turnovers. The Huskies converted on the turnovers for 21 points while the Cats failed to take advantage of UConn's 19 turnovers, scoring only 11 points.

Throughout the game, the Cats had numerous opportunities to take the lead. After Greg Woodard hit a three-pointer nearly two minutes into the second half, the Cats forced four consecutive turnovers but failed to convert these chances at the other end. Both Calvin Byrd and Lance Miller committed fouls under the hoop. Byrd then missed a dunk off the break and Anthony Pelle missed a layup.

Every coach realizes that the first four minutes of the second half has a monumental effect on the outcome of the game, especially on the road against a 16-1 Husky squad. But, despite struggling on the defensive side, the Cats remained in the game by playing strong defense that limited the Huskies to just 38.5 percent from the field. 'Nova also shut down the Big East's leading scorer Chris Smith, holding the senior guard to 12 points and no field goals.

"We prepared for Villanova's matchup zone defense," said UConn Coach Jim Calhoun. "It shouldn't have bothered us, but it did. We really feel great to come away with this win."

In the first half, the Huskies built their largest lead up to nine points with 3:45 left on a Scott Burrell jump shot. The Cats, however, stormed back and went on a mini-run, outscoring the Huskies 9-4 for the remainder of the half. The Huskies led at halftime, 37-33.

> We prepared for Villanova's matchup zone defense. It shouldn't have bothered us, but it did.
> UConn Head Coach Jim Calhoun

The second half saw the Cats waste numerous chances to capitalize on the Huskies' sloppy play. Questionable officiating hurt the Cats as several 'Nova players were called for borderline charges when the team was attempting to make a run.

The Huskies extended the lead to double digits with 3:48 remaining when Smith hit two free throws. With poor shooting, the Cats could not claw back into the game.

Lance Miller played another fine all-around game netting 21 points plus nine rebounds and four assists. Arron Bain contributed 10 points off the bench.

Traveling to the Providence Civic Center Jan. 25, the Cats encountered a hungry Friars team that earlier in the week lost a tough-fought overtime game to UConn. P.C. played a poised game especially in the latter stages of the second half and spoiled a 'Nova-UConn rematch which would have been a battle for sole possession atop the Big East.

In the first half, 'Nova managed to stay close despite shooting a meager 30 percent from the field, trailing by only two at halftime, 30-28. The second half was a different story as the Friars' inside attack took over. P.C. outrebounded the Cats 21-14 and pounded the offensive glass for 12 rebounds. Marques Bragg accounted for seven of those second half offensive rebounds.

The Cats put Providence on the line repeatedly and the young Friars cooly converted on 10 of 14 free throws to ice the game and give Coach Rick Barnes his first conference win this season, 63-55.

Woodard paced the Cats with 18 points and Miller chipped in 11.

NOTES: The Cats inked highly-touted prospect Lawrence Thomas of Elizabeth (N.J.) High. The 6-foot Thomas, one of the top ten prep point guards in the nation, averages 21 points and five assists. Also of interest, CBS's Jim Nantz recently selected the "sub-.500" Cats as one of his darkhorses to reach the Final four.

'Nova loses hearbreaker

By ED WASIELEWSKI
Assistant Sports Editor

The women's basketball team is currently enduring a seven-game losing streak, including recent home losses to Big East foes Providence and nationally-ranked Miami. The Cats' record presently stands at 4-12 overall and 1-7 in the Big East.

In their Jan. 24 matchup against the Lady Friars, the Cats suffered a heartbreaking 82-80 double-overtime loss. After tying the game on a last-second shot and forcing the first extra session, 'Nova gave up a buzzer-beating, court-length drive by P.C.'s Sonya Lewis which forced the second overtime period. Despite the heroics of Nikki Benedix, who scored 32 points and grabbed 10 rebounds, the shellshocked Cats played catch-up basketball in the second overtime and failed to overcome the poised Lady Friars.

Throughout the opening half, the Cats managed to stay within striking distance despite sending Providence to the foul line nine times and turning the ball over 12 times. Forward Tracy Lis exploded for 16 points and 'Nova struggled from the field, shooting just 43.8 percent. Nonetheless, the Cats trailed by only four at halftime, 33-29.

In the second half, 'Nova started freshman Lisa Baglio to defend the hot-shooting Lis. For the next six minutes, Baglio shutout P.C.'s high scorer and the Cats seized their largest lead of the contest, 38-35.

Over the final ten minutes, the Lady Friars commanded leads of up to six points but Nova battled back to whittle the P.C. advantage down to 61-59. With under two minutes left, the Cats committed successive turnovers. But, the defense responded and the Cats shutdown the P.C. offense. With under one minute remaining, Benedix came up with a key steal as she stripped Providence guard Jen Cole in the backcourt. Benedix could not convert on two layup chances but Sheri Walker's follow-up gave the Cats a 61-61 deadlock which forced overtime.

"You can get a lot of satisfaction from this game," said Head Coach Harry Perretta. "We would have lost by eight or nine points in a game like this in the beginning of the year, but we didn't lose our cool and we came back when we were down with five minutes left (in regulation)."

> We tried everything on defense. Nothing worked.
> Head Coach Harry Perretta

The first extra session saw the Lady Friars seize a sizeable five-point margin halfway through the period. However, the Cats calmly fought back once again to take the lead with 42 seconds left as Benedix came up with another steal and converted the layup and the subsequent foul shot. With only 7.6 seconds left, freshman Michelle Thornton (20 points, six assists, seven rebounds) was fouled and hit one of two free throws. P.C. called a timeout and then inbounded the ball to Lewis who knifed through the 'Nova defense to hit a driving layup as time expired to knot the score at 71-71.

The second overtime saw the Cats fall behind early and two key players, Benedix and Baglio, foul out within one minute of each other. 'Nova dropped the hard-fought game 82-80.

"We stuck together and played an excellent game," said Benedix.

In their following game against the Big East's first-place Hurricanes, the Cats dropped a 75-50 game that was decided later in the first half. Behind the potent inside duo of Frances Savage (10 points, 10 rebounds) and Vicki Plowden (17 points, nine rebounds), Miami shot 48.3 percent for the game and 55.6 percent in the second half to pull away from the Cats. Sharpshooter Jeannie Hebert lead the 'Canes with 19 points.

'Nova managed to stay close in the first half, but the Hurricanes' superior personnel and depth wore down the Cats.

"We tried a box-and-one, a diamond-and-two, every kind of zone," said Perretta. "We tried everything on defense. Nothing worked."

For the Cats, Benedix led the way with 12 points and seven rebounds. Senior Eloise Berry, in her first start this season, responded with a team-high eight rebounds. Centers Karen Connell and Jen Maga each chipped in eight points.

'Nova next travels to the Carrier Dome tomorrow for a 5:30 p.m. encounter with Syracuse.

THE POINT AFTER

Prop 48: The debate rages on

By ANDY FITZPATRICK
Sports Editor

For six years now, the NCAA has attempted to improve the academics of the student-athlete by re-emphasizing the importance of an education. The way that the NCAA hoped to accomplish this was by passing Proposition 48, commonly referred to as Prop. 48 actually made inroads in improving the academic situation in college, or has it worked in a reverse manner by restricting the chances for an athlete to attend school?

First of all, what exactly is Prop. 48? The proposition was put into law in 1985, and what it does is put specific standards on SAT scores and high school courses and grades. For freshmen who want to be eligible, they must have earned a 2.0 grade-point average in 11 standard college preparatory courses and attained a minimum combined score of 700 on the SAT. If an athlete fails to meet these requirements, he or she will still be admitted on scholarship but will not be able to play until sophomore year, assuming that satisfactory progress during freshman year has been achieved. The rule also states that while in college, athletes must make continued progress toward earning their degree.

"I am not enamored with what they mean," said Billy Packer, college basketball analyst for CBS Sports. "A kid that scores a 690 is ineligible but one with a 710 is fine. There is such a fine line."

Big East Conference Commissioner Mike Tranghese sees Prop. 48 strictly as an academic issue. He thinks, though, that the decision whether or not to admit athletes who fail to meet the requirements is up to the individual school. "The school ought to be allowed to decide who they want," said Tranghese.

James DeLorenzo, the sports information director at Villanova University, is also a backer of Prop. 48, saying that "it is a good thing to have checks and balances to prevent abuses,and it works on earning a degree." He also said that it is good criteria, and, without it, colleges are exploiting the athletes.

Packer believes that a kid who barely records a 700 on the SAT should not be allowed in the top schools, regardless of athletic skill, because they cannot compete in the classroom.

Stalker sighted on South Campus

By JENNIFER CASTELLI
News Editor

An incident involving an older man spying on a student taking a shower has spurred a reevaluation of how secure residence halls on campus really are. The student said that the man resembled a police sketch of a suspect who assaulted a student at Bryn Mawr College. The sketch was that of a 6-foot 20-25 year old Caucasian male with dark hair, dark eyes, unkempt hair and an unshaven face.

The stalker was seen by a female freshman student, whose name is being withheld, in Katharine Hall Jan. 28 at approximately 7 p.m.

"I was in the shower and I looked down. He was laying down on his back in the shower stall next to me and looking up at me," the student said.

"I screamed and he ran away. He was very lucky that no one else was around to catch him," she said.

The victim's roommate tried to find the man, but he had already fled the scene.

"As long as you have an open campus like we do, these things can happen," said Jeffrey B. Horton, director of Public Safety. However, there have not been any other incidents like this reported at the University, he said.

"The community is generally safe, but anything can happen anywhere," said the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of Students.

A description of the suspect was circulated at emergency floor meetings in Katharine Hall Jan. 29, said Bernadine O'Leary, head resident assistant of the hall.

"Many people have seen someone fitting the description in Good Counsel [Hall]. Evidently, this guy has been picking up Villanova students who are hitchhiking, taking them back to campus, and then coming back at a later date to look for these girls," said O'Leary.

The case has been turned over to the Radnor Township police.

"We think we know who the person is, and hopefully an arrest can be made," Horton said.

There has been concern about safety on campus, and there have been efforts during the last few years to improve safety. Students are encouraged to look after themselves by not hitchhiking, being

Theft a problem in '91

By PATRICK WHITE
Staff Reporter

The University community experienced some crimes during the fall semester, but headway has been made in solving them, said Director of Public Safety, Jeffrey B. Horton.

One of the major problems of the fall semester was the frequent theft of bicycles, particularly mountain bikes, Horton said. Thieves use such methods as applying freon to locks and then breaking them, he added.

The Public Safety Department is working out the details of an agreement with a bicycle lock company to provide University students with better locks at reduced prices.

> There were serious assaults last semester in which students required medical attention.

Vacations during last semester passed without the major robberies which have taken place in the past, said Horton, adding that increased security and patrols in dormitories were primary reasons for this decrease.

Horton said Villanova must "talk and work together with the surrounding communities." Investigating officers from Public Safety have worked many times with the Radnor Police and have developed a good rapport with them.

Horton said there are problems associated with being a "college town." "The citizens in the towns surrounding Villanova remember

University Student Senate attends '92 NASCCU convention at Notre Dame

By LARISA EPATKO

Members of the University Student Senate attended a NASCCU (National Association of Students at Catholic Colleges and Universities) conference at the University of Notre Dame Jan.31-Feb. 2. NASCCU serves as a forum for representing the ideas and views of students at Catholic institutions throughout the United States.

"The conference was a good opportunity to meet with other Catholic universities around the nation and see what they are doing about issues that we are all faced with," said Ken Batchelor, senator of the College of Arts and Sciences.

NASCCU was established in 1989, and this year marked its third national meeting. "NASCCU was founded with one goal: to echo the missing voice of the student at the Catholic University," said Chris Soller, 1991 president of NASCCU.

Each year the conference focused on a given topic, Batchelor said. The first two years of NASCCU focused on academic freedom (1990) and AIDS education (1991), said Batchelor.

The 1992 forum addressed "Service in Society: The Role of the Catholic College and University." "The ideas of community service further strengthened the already established programs on [Villanova's] campus," said Batchelor.

The Rev. William Byron, S.J., president of Catholic University of America, delivered the keynote address on service in society.

Byron is part of a committee that is working to lobby government and Congress for community service legislation for schools, said Arts and Sciences Sen. Pres ton Hrisko, who also attended the conference.

Byron's work would allow schools to apply for government funding to work for community service, said Hrisko. "Schools have the intention, but it does cost money," he added.

Byron presented to the students from 20 colleges and universities the idea of making service mandatory in their curriculum, Hrisko said.

Students could attend issue discussion groups led by the Notre Dame faculty. The topics included: AIDS on the Catholic Campus. The Role of Women in the Catholic Church, Programs and Possibilities to Serve the Community, Improving Your Serve and ethics, Business, Faith.

Batchelor said the University of Notre Dame set up a S.W.A.T. (Students With AIDS Training) team, where students who have been trained by the state inform their peers about AIDS facts.

Batchelor said he compared Notre Dame's S.W.A.T. team to Villanova's AIDS Education Task Force comprised of students and

Cabaret singer Gennifer Flowers claimed last week in Star magazine that she and the leading Democratic candidate for president, Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton, carried on a "torrid 12 year love-affair."

Flowers claims she has audiotapes which substantiate her accusations. Although both Clinton and his wife Hillary denounced the allegations, his reputation as a solid leader may be questioned by many American voters who once believed Clinton to be a credible candidate.

College Republican President Mark Thomas believes the "Democrats will try to down play the scandal, because it is definitely not positive.

"Because Clinton replied to the charges in a narrow way and did not go beyond the charges, he gave some people the impression that he may in fact have had an affair or have had affairs in the past," Thomas added.

College Democrat President Stacy Couch had no "direct response" concerning Flower's claims.

Research on all of the Democratic candidates is still being conducted, Couch said, and no official comments from the College Democrats are available.

"Because of the publicity Clinton is receiving, his name is becoming more well-known to the American people," said former College Democrat Vice President Kati Suprenuk.

"The only things which are relevant [to me] are what a public official does in office. What you do after work is your own business," Suprenuk added.

"Even within the past few decades, several presidents have been faced with similar allegations, most recently, Kennedy, Reagan and even Bush. If this is the criteria for being elected, many successful past presidents would never have been given an opportunity in office.

"If Clinton can pull this country out of an economic tailspin, his personal life should not be a consideration and would not impair his ability to govern," said Suprenuk.

The dispute between a public official's personal conduct and civic responsibility is a matter of great political debate and uncertainty. Whether American voters can overlook the adultery accusations remains to be seen.

"A broad spectrum of different views exist in the general population as well as in the college age voting population," said Thomas.

Right now, it is too early to speculate as to how these allegations will affect Clinton's campaign, his chances of winning the Democratic nomination and the manner in which voters will cast their ballots, added Thomas.

MOSCOW

Russian President Boris Yeltsin issued a plea for world financial support. His request came attached with a warning that a lack of money could lead to the collapse of his reforms and to renewed Cold War problems.

Yeltsin and President Bush have just signed "A Declaration on New Relations" to reinforce their pledges of cooperation. Yeltsin claims that this pledge will be meaningless if the reforms in Russia are halted from a lack of funding.

Yeltsin said the present funding levels from the United States will not be sufficient to guarantee a permanent end to the arms race. As the Russian economy changes into free market form, it is suffering.

Russian leaders claim that their pleas for monetary support will ensure that the Cold War tensions will not be felt again.

INDIANAPOLIS

With the problems of Clarence Thomas and Anita Hill and the rape trial of William Kennedy Smith ended, a trial in Indiana has started which may overshadow the others.

Even though television cameras are not allowed in Indiana courtrooms, the eyes of the country will be focused on Mike Tyson as he answers charges of rape, criminal deviate conduct and confinement.

If convicted on all counts, Tyson faces a possible 63-year sentence. Testimony from a doctor who examined the woman the day after the alleged incident revealed injuries "consistent with forced intercourse."

The beauty contestant told the doctor at the time that she was scared because it would be her word against Tyson's. Tyson's defense argues that the woman consented to having sex with him. These injuries have been debated in the trial thus far, as both sides question whether or not they could have been sustained during consensual sex.

DIYARBAKIR, Turkey

The Middle East recently received some of the heaviest snow in its history. Turkey was the recipient of weather with the most lethal results.

A succession of avalanches swamped villages across the southeastern section of the country. Hundreds were pronounced dead and there is fear that this number will increase.

The village of Gormec, near the town Sirnak, was the most damaged. Rescue teams from Turkey and the United States reached the town to find it enveloped in snow. At least 71 people died, many fast asleep, as walls of snow covered their houses.

At the village of Tunekpinar, 30 men were dug out alive and 23 died. Most of the remaining reported deaths occurred in small numbers around the numerous villages in the southeast.

Conditions have hampered both countries' efforts to rescue people believed to be buried alive under several feet of snow.

IOWA

Iowa's family farm system is in shambles, and the economy has its head buried in the sand. The Democratic caucus may become this year's political joke because of Senator Tom Harkin, D-Iowa.

Harkin is staging a bid for the Democratic nomination to the presidency. Many Iowans feel Harkin has turned the Feb. 10 caucus into a personal endorsement.

This year as few as 30,000 Democrats may vote caucus night. It appears Harkin's opponents have allowed him victory in his state without a battle.

Groups sponsor sexual communications lecture

By ELIZABETH BARSZCZEWSKI
Assistant News Editor

A lecture devoted to helping male and female students better communicate with each other was presented by Andrea Parrot of Cornell University Jan. 30.

The focus of Parrot's lecture, "Sexual Communication for the '90s," discussed the way in which men and women communicate, and sometimes miscommunicate, their ideas and feelings to each other. Parrot emphasized the fact that in today's society people do not feel that they have permission to talk about sex as they do about such topics as cigarettes and smoking.

"It is impossible to talk about sex and what we want if we do not have the vocabulary and do not feel that we have permission to talk about sex," Parrot said.

Another factor which plays heavily in the way men and women sexually communicate to each other is the messages both sexes receive from such sources as their parents, peers and the media, Parrot said.

Men and women are expected to act differently when it comes to sex. While males are encouraged to act "like real men" and "score" or "go for it" by their male friends as well as the media, women are expected to be feminine and soft, as well as sexy and alluring, Parrot said.

During the lecture, Parrot presented a short video made for students at Cornell University. The tape demonstrated a scenario which is not uncommon on most college campuses. It showed two college students, a man and woman, and the circumstances leading to an eventual acquaintance rape of the young woman. The video illustrated how the signals men and women send to each other can be confusing.

Perhaps what is most bothersome about the entire issue of date rape is that it is not always easy to spot a potential rapist, Parrot said. Many people have the common misconception that a rapist is some deranged stranger in a trenchcoat who leaps out from behind bushes and attacks women at knife-point, Parrot said. A potential rapist could be an honor student, president of the student council or star athlete, she added.

Rape is defined as "forced penetration of any kind against a person's will without their consent," said Parrot. It is important to note that the absence of a "no" does not mean automatically that a party has consented to the wishes of another, she said.

It is impossible to talk about sex and what we want if we do not have the vocabulary and do not feel that we have permission to talk about sex.
Andrea Parrot, Cornell University

It is also not absolutely necessary for a person to say "no," Parrot said. It is considered rape when one party takes advantage of another party that may be unconscious, mentally incapacitated or if that party feels that their life is in serious jeopardy if they do not go along with the aggressor's wishes, she added.

Parrot offered a few suggestions as to what can be done to prevent a rape from occurring. One of the most important things a woman can do is to listen to her gut, Parrot said. Many times women will ignore their intuition about a situation and dismiss their feelings, she added.

Also, it is very important for women to realize that they have every right to get out of a situation in which they feel threatened or uncomfortable. It is very important for women to be clear with the verbal and physical signals they give men, Parrot said.

For men, the most important thing to remember is that "no" means "no" the very first time a woman says it, she added.

The lecture was sponsored by the vice presidents for Academic Affairs and Student Life, the Dean of Students office, Public Safety, the Honors Program, the Student Programming Council, the Resident Student Association, the Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils and the Women's Studies program.

Writing Center expands service

By JOHN MULLIGAN
Associate Editor

The University Writing Center assisted students from 15 departments and three colleges in 647 appointments last semester, said Karyn Hollis, professor of English and Writing Center coordinator.

"We are happy that students are benefiting from our collaborative work with them," said Hollis, who has worked to train peer tutors and expand University writing services over the past few years.

The Writing Center staff consists of 18 undergraduate and graduate student tutors. Located on the second floor of Vasey Hall, the center accepts students by appointment.

"We do help students who walk-in if there is a tutor available," said Hollis. However, due to overwhelming student response last semester, appointments are advised, she added.

The staff assists students with development of ideas, said Matt Kaminski, peer tutor and junior accounting major. "We try to challenge students to expand their ideas and explore their thoughts on a topic," Kaminski said.

"We like to help people at any stage of the composing process from brainstorming ideas about an assignment to refining the style of a final draft," said Hollis.

Students come to the Writing Center with a variety of materials, said Hollis. The staff assisted students with papers, speeches, essays and applications.

We did really well last semester. It was quite busy and both students and consultants seemed pleased with the sessions.
Lachlan Whalen, Writing Center coordinator

Students came from 15 departments, including English, history, philosophy, nursing and economics. "The material I saw was quite diverse," said Kaminski.

"Over 90 percent of the students rated our service either very helpful or helpful," said Hollis.

"We did really well last semester. It was quite busy and both students and consultants seemed pleased with the sessions," said Lachlan Whalen, graduate student and Writing Center coordinator.

Students feel effects of the annual influenze epidemic

By TANYA C. RUSYNKO
Staff Reporter

The University experienced an increase in cases of influenza (flu) this winter. The number of upper respiratory infections and the reported number of flu cases was significantly higher this season than in past years, said Dr. Denis Boyle, the director and attending physician of the campus infirmary.

In December alone we saw 300 more [students] for upper respiratory infections than last year.
Dr. Denis Boyle, M.D.

"In December alone we saw 300 more [students] with upper respiratory infections than last year," Boyle said. There were approximately 1,000 students who went to the infirmary complaining of flu and cold symptoms in November, said Boyle. In December, that number dropped to 800, but in the first three weeks of the semester, that number had already reached 700.

There has also been an increase in the number of cases of mononucleosis (mono). However, that is a separate virus, he said.

Boyle recommends that students try to get adequate rest and maintain proper nutrition.

Denis A. Boyle, M.D.

"Your ability to fight off disease decreases with too little sleep and improper nutrition... It's difficult to maintain your health burning the candle at both ends," he said.

The most important means of avoiding the flu is to "keep cognizant of personal hygiene habits," said Boyle. He said most people are "pretty knowledgeable about taking care of themselves," but that may not be enough. If someone you live with is sick, it is very likely that you will be, too, Boyle said.

"I recommend lots of fluids, proper sleep, and proper nutrition. Students need to beware of secondary infections that can result from upper respiratory problems which are not properly treated," said Boyle. This year's flu seemed to have a much longer duration than past years and was also marked by severe headaches.

Boyle said optimistically that "this area is starting to see a downswing [in flu cases]."

Although the flu season is coming to a close, Boyle believes more students should be vaccinated in September and October to avoid another major outbreak next year. "I highly recommend [the influenza vaccine]. It used to be for the elderly and the very young, but next year it will be more prevalent among people of all ages."

Boyle said the Villanova community should be more prepared for the next flu season from what they have learned this winter.

New orientation slogan named

By JENNIFER CASTELLI
News Editor

The New Student Orientation Steering Committee traveled to Stone Harbor, N.J., Jan. 29 to Feb. 2, for their annual Leadership Weekend. The staff decided on the 1992 orientation theme of "Further Tradition With Wildcat Ambition." The staff is dedicated to making the orientation program a success, said Kyle Kelley, steering committee member.

"We've been the No. 2 orientation program the last two years. We want to become number one. Great staffs can make great things happen," said junior committee member Aaron Nicodemus.

The staff spent the weekend retreat deciding on a theme and program areas for orientation, while promoting good working relationships within the committee, said Kelley.

There will be an information meeting Feb. 11 at 8 p.m. in the Day Hop for all those interested in orientation counselor or administrative assistant positions, said Kelley. "You've got nothing to lose and everything to gain [in applying]. If you are interested in participating in the program, it is an incredible experience," he said.

Applications will be available at the Feb. 11 meeting and at the Dean of Students' office. Applications will be due at 12 p.m., Feb. 18.

We've been the number two orientation program the last two years. We want to become number one.

The committee is made up of Christina Olson, student chairperson; Steve Ball, administrative coordinator; David Connelly; Brendan Courtney; Christine Cuesta; Chris DeSanto; Mike Donahue; Betsy Ferrone; Nicole Furst; Tammy Hall; Tara Kennedy; Tiy Smith; Nicodemus and Kelley. Islamic, Jewish, Christian interpretations do change

By National Catholic Reporter

"We are at an impasse. Each of our traditions, Judaism, Christianity, Islam, has at its core a central 'absolute,' which is nonnegotiable and blocks the possibility of genuine dialogue: the chosen people/Promised Land, the Christ, the Qur'an."

Thus, the situation was described one year ago in Orlando, Fla., at the end of the third annual "International Scholars Jewish-Christian-Muslim Dialogue," sponsored by the Journal of Ecumenical Studies (Temple University) and the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

The group is made up of nine scholars each from Judaism, Christianity and Islam, coming from the United States, Germany, England, Israel, Yugoslavia, Spain, Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, Pakistan, India and Kenya.

In the past year, the "Trialogue" made those three absolutes the focus of their intense research: nine papers were prepared on the respective absolutes as found in each tradition's scriptures, history and contemporary thought. These papers were the basis of the dialogue Jan. 2-5 at Emory University in Atlanta.

The "chosen people," with its intimate connection to the "Promised Land," has been understood by Jews on one extreme to mean that the Jewish people are uniquely privileged by God and that the Holy Land (stretching from the Nile to the Euphrates, that is from the heart of Egypt to the heart of Iraq) has been eternally committed by God to their complete possession.

More commonly, the "chosen people" concept has been understood to mean that the Jews — now scattered in the Diaspora — have been chosen to make known to the "nations" God's ethical laws, including the Ten Commandments. Some Jews even spoke of possessing, that is, living in, the Holy Land without necessarily having sovereignty.

Clearly, the chosen people/Promised Land is only a "relative absolute," given to constant interpretation and negotiation.

In modern times, the idea of the chosen people has been quasi-rejected by some Jews, as reflected in the humorous verse, "How odd of God to choose the Jews," and even directly repudiated by others, Mordicai Kaplan and the Reconstructionists, for example. Even Zionism is understood by some Jews to mean that the state in the Holy Land should include fully non-Jews as well as Jews.

Clearly, the chosen people/Promised Land is only a "relative absolute," given to constant interpretation and negotiation. Concerning the Christian nonnegotiable absolute, Jesus the Christ, the variation in interpretation over the centuries has been as great.

The first followers of Jesus experienced Him as a great teacher and spokesperson, or prophet, of God: a rabbi and nabi. Some of His followers also saw Him as the Messiah (the "anointed one of God") who would expel the hated occupiers of the Holy Land, reestablish the Kingdom of Israel and bring peace throughout the world.

Because of his execution, however, Jesus was not perceived by most Jews thereafter as the Messiah, but for the gentile followers the Hebrew "Messiah" was greatly spiritualized into the Greek "Christ."

The metaphorically-oriented Semitic language of the New Testament was later increasingly misunderstood by the then mostly Hellenistic followers of Jesus as if it were Greek abstract metaphysical language — thus, in the early ecumenical councils, claiming divinity as well as humanity for Jesus.

This meant that Jesus the Christ was "absolute"; all truth and goodness was to be found in Him. There was no point to dialogue with non-Christians, since they could not communicate truth or value that the Christians did not already possess in their founder, Christ.

However, today there are many committed Christian scholars who are convinced of the rightness of the view of the first followers of Jesus: Jesus is experienced as a great teacher and model of how to live an authentic human, indeed, "divine" life. Moreover, Jesus was divine for He was totally open to and filled with all reality, including ultimate reality, God. However, because Jesus' humanity was filled with divinity did not mean that divinity did not also permeate other beings, including other religious figures.

Clearly, the nonnegotiable absolute, the Christ, was often interpreted both in initial and contemporary Christianity in a "relatively absolute" manner, that is, as absolutely the best teacher and model of life for Christians, without excluding the possibility of other religious figures being teachers and models of life for others.

For traditional Islam (the term means "to submit" to God), its nonnegotiable absolute, the Qur'an, is the very word of God dictated verbatim to Mohammed by the archangel Gabriel — correcting the previous revelations of God found in the Bible, but distorted there by the Jews and Christians. Thus, not to follow the Qur'an is not to follow God's correct word, not "to submit" to God.

However, in contemporary Islam an increasing number of scholars and educated laity understand the Qur'an as God's message,and therefore absolute, but necessarily communicated to limited humans in a human, and therefore limited, language.

Nursing credits to transfer from Montco

University Press Release

In an experimental pilot project with the Department of Nursing at Montgomery County Community College (Montco), the College of Nursing is now transferring Montco nursing credits toward the BSN degree at Villanova.

After a careful evaluation of the equivalency of Montco's nursing courses with the nursing challenge exams required of registered nurse students in the College of Nursing, the direct transfer of the 36 credits earned in Montco's Associate Degree in Nursing program was approved.

In order to assure continuing quality in the RN-BSN completion track in the College of Nursing, two conditions must be met by Montco graduates for transfer of their nursing credits: 1) they must have a "B" average in their nursing courses; and 2) they must have graduated from Montco within the past five years.

In addition to the direct transfer of nursing credits from Montco, the agreement clarifies the applicability of the required liberal education courses at Montco. All the required credits in the Montco program are eligible for transfer toward the Villanova BSN degree. Like other RN students, Montco students will take a minimum of six nursing courses at the University.

The project reflects national trends in RN-BSN completion programs as well as the College of Nursing's progressive development of its RN-BSN track and its long-standing ties with Montco. Founded in 1970, the Department of Nursing at Montco has been NLN-accredited since 1987. Four of Villanova's MSN graduates are full-time faculty of the Montco Department of Nursing, and the Chair, Dorothy Campbell, MSN, RN, is a member of Alpha Nu Chapter of Sigma Theta Tau. Dean Fitzpatrick serves on the Montco Department of Nursing Advisory Council.

careful about whom they let in residence halls and not propping doors open, Stack said.

Students put themselves in situations that can lead to trouble. Doors were reported being propped open 45 times in one day on South Campus, said Jeaneen Riely, south area coordinator.

"I think Villanova should reevaluate its security system. There are a million options that other schools have [to ensure a safe environment in the residence halls] that we could implement," the victim said.

Temporarily, the residence halls on South Campus are locked 24 hours a day, but this is not a practical solution, said O'Leary. An idea to install combination locks on bathroom doors is also being considered as an alternative deterrent, she said.

"Villanova is looking at an access control system for the residence halls where you would need a card similar to a meal card to gain access to the buildings," said Horton. This is only one of several possibilities but nothing is going to be foolproof, he said.

Students should keep their doors locked at all times and report any suspicious persons to Public Safety, said Horton.

Salvadorans mark end of war

By National Catholic Reporter

While government and guerrilla leaders were signing an agreement in Mexico Jan. 16 to put an end to the country's 12-year civil war, tens of thousands of Salvadorans marched to the Plaza of the Martyrs in front of the San Salvador cathedral and stayed all night and into the next morning for speeches, singing groups, dance companies, an ecumenical service and a dance.

"What happened in front of the cathedral," said San Salvador Auxiliary Bishop Gregoria Rosa Chavez, "was exactly the opposite of what we lived through at Archbishop [Oscar] Romero's funeral," when shooting broke out and people were killed. Foreign church leaders present at the funeral said government forces began the shooting."

But Salvadorans differed on how to begin building a new country. Government and army leaders said the first step should be a total amnesty for all acts committed during the war, but opposition political leaders and the San Salvador archdiocese disagreed. "Should the future be built on truth and justice, or on forgiving and forgetting all the crimes which degraded our country?" asked Rosa Chavez.

Crimes

that it is only a small minority of students who cause problems," he added.

Two increasing problems can be very dangerous, Horton said. There were serious assaults last semester in which students required medical attention.

"I would like to see a large decrease in the number of these assaults," said Horton. "I have also seen an increase in hitchhiking, which is not good judgement because there is no way of knowing who will pick you up," he added.

Public Safety has taken the offensive by offering several programs, particularly in the area of sexual assault, said Horton. Students should report suspicious individuals to Public Safety, he added.

faculty and gave some information to the S.W.A.T. team.

The University has an established community service program, Batchelor said, adding that other schools were comparing themselves to Villanova. "The conference was interesting and enlightening, but we all felt like we were debating something that we already had established here," he said.

The University hosts activities for charities throughout the year, including Lip-It, Balloon Day and events sponsored by Campus Ministry, Hrisko said.

"NASCCU has a lot of potential to serve as a collective voice in the future for students . . . The idea of assembling representatives from various Catholic colleges and universities has a lot of merit," O'Rourke said.

NASCCU has a lot of potential to serve as a collective voice in the future for students ... The idea of assembling representatives from various Catholic colleges and universities has a lot of merit.

Mark O'Rourke,
Student Government president

What distinguishes NASCCU is "it seeks to represent what is unique about Catholic colleges and universities," said O'Rourke. "Other universities have organizations to represent their special interests."

O'Rourke said the only recommendation he has for NASCCU is to coordinate with major Catholic or national publications and journals to boost its profile.

"If they [NASCCU] worked with the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Association of Catholic College and University Presidents, it would assist them in achieving their goals," said O'Rourke.

Communication can end sexual conflicts

Have you ever been in an uncomfortable situation with a member of the opposite sex where you were harassed or felt obligated to "make a move?" The results of such encounters can be terrifying.

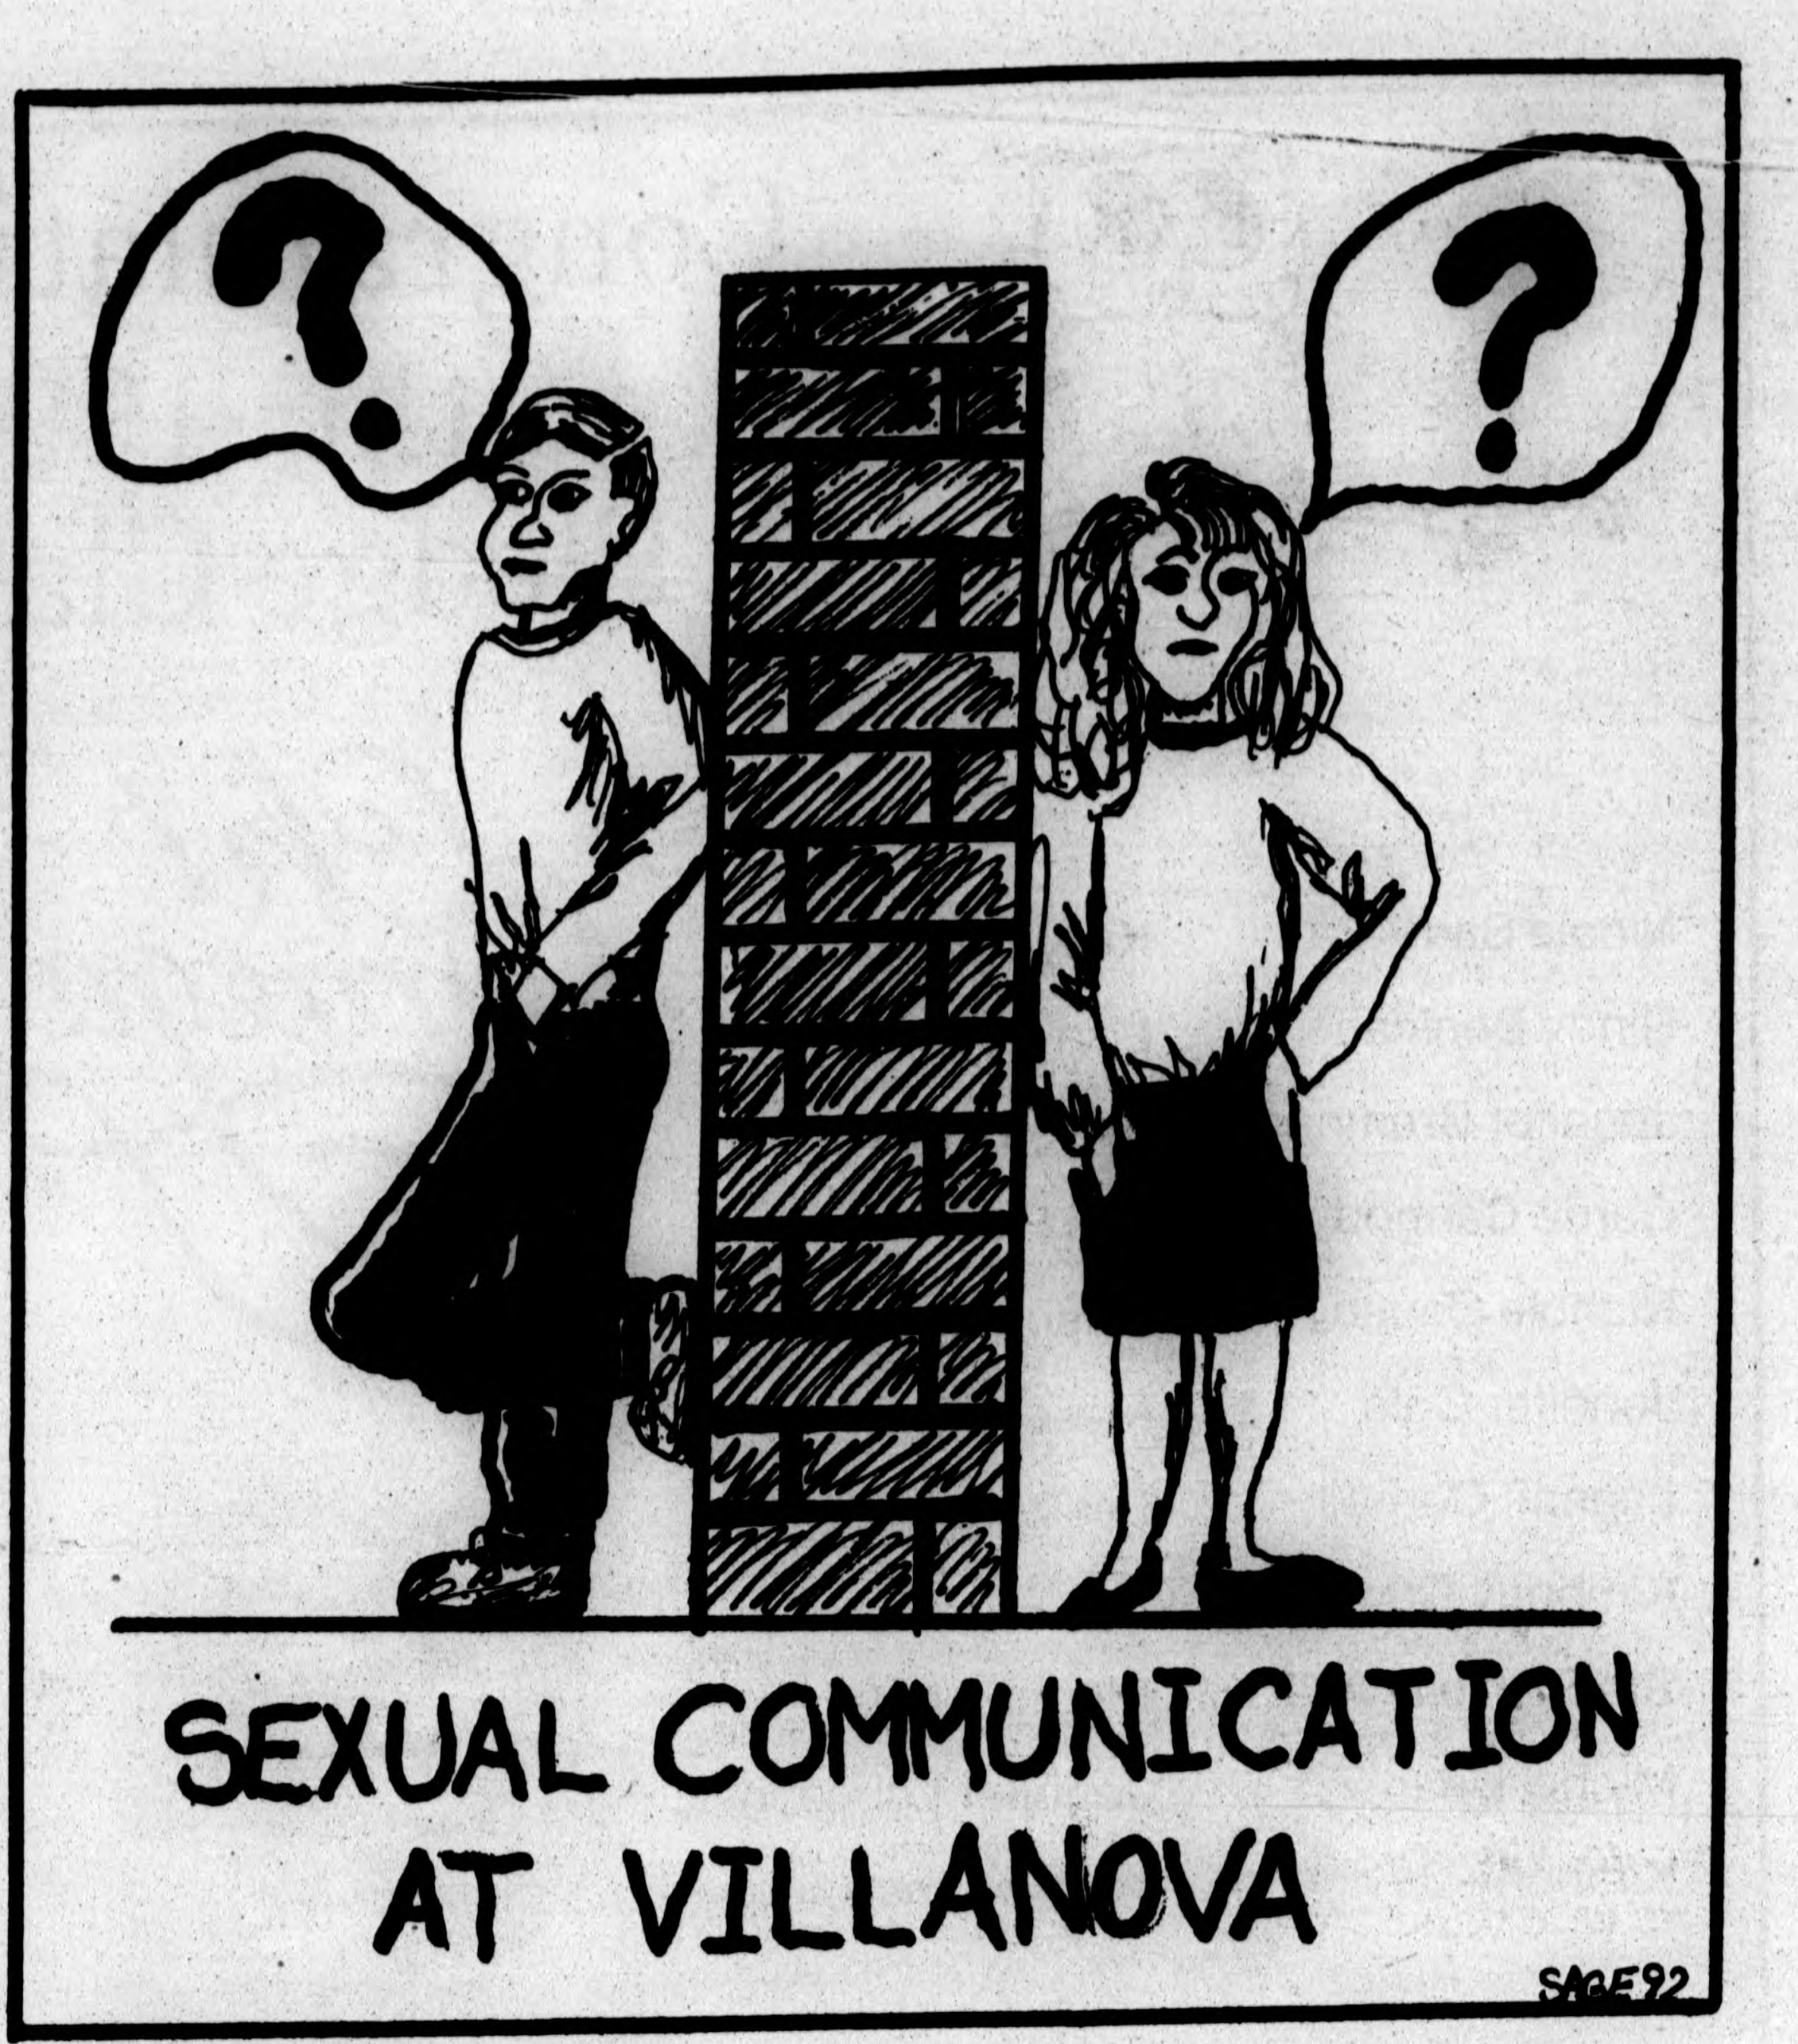
For a male to affirm his "manliness" through strong words or actions toward a female is criminal and immature. For a female to be ignorant of her rights and options is potentially dangerous. The consequences are too severe.

Last week, a much-needed seminar discussed "Sexual Communication for the '90s" at the University. We hope its message will affect our University community which, like all college campuses, has problems with interaction between the sexes.

As the trial of Mike Tyson shows, misconceptions and stereotypes of both men and women still prevail. Ignorance and miscommunication can lead to sexual harassment and acquaintence rape. One out of every five college women suffers some form of sexual harrassment.

Although women must not allow themselves to be in a possibly dangerous situation, men must understand that "no" means "no." If a woman dresses provocatively, it does not mean she wants to have sex. If she comes up to your dorm room on a Saturday night, you cannot expect that she wants you to make a move. Unfortunately, these simple guidelines are not followed because of poor communication.

You must take control of yourself. You must express your feelings. You must be able to communicate your fears and desires. The horrors of sexual harrassment and rape will not end until men and women address each other openly and as equals.



Does University challenge you?

How do you assess the intellectual atmosphere at Villanova? Are you challenged by your classes and your peers?

The answers to these questions may be personal and highly subjective. Your major, choice of classes and work ethic may influence your answer. Yet, a case may be made that the University needs to further develop its intellectual atmosphere.

Each of us can find classes that require minimal effort. Some of us seek these classes on a regular basis. What are we gaining by taking such courses? Very little, except for a grade.

The challenge is ours. The cost of higher education is enormous. We must not underestimate our power as students.

We cannot allow ourselves to be merely processed through this institution. It is imperative that we shape the institution that educates us. Without students, this University would cease to function. If you feel that your peers or your professors do not foster a true intellectual atmosphere, speak up.

Some students do graduate with minimal effort. Some professors do teach with low expectations. This may not seem fair. But, the student who challenges himself/herself and the professor who expects effort are much more successful in the long run.

Challenge yourself. Challenge your professors. Seek classes that will give you new knowledge, not only a grade.

Ideas challenge, seek change

To the Editor:

Is Villanova University a slum lord? Well, you may think so if you take a visit to the student gym located in the Nevin Field House. Each day over 100 students utilize this facility, yet the University maintenance crew is still looking for it on the Blue Route. Repeated calls for a fresh coat of paint or a squirt of W-D 40 have gone unanswered. Poor maintenance is one thing, but disrepair of the equipment poses a serious hazard for everyone using the facility.

Enough waxing of the gym floor, get a mop! Get a screwdriver and repair the equipment before more students are injured on poorly maintained equipment.

To the Editor:

Buried alive? I knew that hundreds of thousands of people had died in the Persian Gulf War. And, like many Americans, I had become numb to their suffering. But I never realized how agonizing those deaths had been until I learned that thousands of Iraqi soldiers died of suffocation when they were buried alive in their trenches.

When I consider that unthinkable horror, I cannot help but remember an analysis I read early on in the war. It described how President Bush had dodged his diplomatic options throughout the pre-war crisis. Steering the nation on a course toward war as though he wanted a war from the start.

Diplomacy is the art of getting the other guy to do what you want, and making him believe it was his idea. Maybe diplomacy would not have worked with Saddam Hussein. He is obviously an irrational monster.

Sometimes it is impossible to reason with monstrous tyrants. But sometimes diplomacy (backed by military muscle) can achieve remarkable results. Remember how John Kennedy handled Nikita Kruschev during the Cuban Missle Crisis? Kruschev backed down and millions of people survived.

The tragedy of the Persian Gulf War is that those deaths might have been avoided. Because we failed to pursue diplomacy, the real tragedy is we will never know.

To the Editor:

An incident of a serious nature has come to the attention of the Villanova Emergency Medical Service (VEMS). At a mass in the Connelly Center a student passed out for unknown reasons Jan. 19.

Someone in the crowd panicked and left the Villanova Room to call for help. Unfortunately, in their panic and haste to get help, the well-intentioned good samaritan dialed 911. As some of you may know, there is no 911 system operational in Delaware County at this time. In the end, the caller finally reached the Chester County Emergency Medical Services who dispatched a paramedic unit from Bryn Mawr Hospital.

The members of VEMS would like to review the procedures for handling medical emergencies which occur on campus. First, do not panic in an emergency. The best way to handle the situation is to remain calm and immediately call the Department of Public Safety.

The phone number to report emergencies on campus is 645-4444 from a public phone or extension 4444 from an inter-campus phone. Public Safety will dispatch trained medical personnel to the scene. These people are specially trained to determine the severity of a medical situation and to begin treatment if required.

Remember, there is no 911 service in Delaware County at this time.

Confusion and anger breed racism

By SHUREA WILSON

I often listen to Philadelphia open-forum radio shows so that I can obtain a quick non-whitewashed tap on popular views. I do not mean popular in the sense of "trendy" or "in" but as in "majority." Over the past year, I have heard the voices of confusion, anger and racism on the airwaves.

First, I heard the voices of confusion. As the recession grew, people were confused when the numbers of the homeless increased and the heights from which they fell reached the middle-class.

> I guess it was inevitable that once people got the taste for blaming one group for their troubles they would move onto other groups.

"What is happening in our country?" asked a growing segment of jobless and endangered. President Bush and his cabinet answered, "Don't worry about a thing because everything is going to be all right." They reassured us, "This is not a recession" and the confusion was prevented from turning into anger for a few weeks. This gave the government enough time to think of a new way to divert the public's questions.

As many people yelled — "What do you mean we can no longer afford the standard of living to which we are accustomed?" — the flag issue became the burning topic on our minds despite its ridiculousness. When this issue began to fade the government gave us a war to help us forget our domestic problems.

We were mollified for quite a while and excited to be Americans. Parades were thrown to keep the feelings of pride alive. This backfired a bit when a few quietly hissed, "The parade cost what?!" Others were able to ignore the insane cost of the national parade in Washington, D.C. Instead, they focused on what they considered a real waste of money — welfare.

I guess it was inevitable that once people got the taste for blaming one group for their troubles they would move to other groups. Their confusion and anger evolved into fear and hatred.

The racism came in disguise. "It's because of the Japanese we are in this condition," some said. Very few asked what kind of corrupt and greedy type of government would watch them slip into such an economic dilemma. It seems the line between the Japanese and Americans who happen to be Japanese blurred and to some extent came the line between Japanese-Americans and all Asian-Americans.

Next came the idea that minorities, especially blacks, were milking the country through welfare. The irony is that although blacks disproportionately partake in welfare they are not the majority of its recipients. Once people got into race the list grew. "If it weren't for Asians taking our jobs, blacks and Latinos refusing to work, Jews hording the money" and the latest "entry of women into the work force then we wouldn't be in this predicament." It comes from the other side too: "Whites are playing with our livelihoods again because it strikes their fancy."

Considering we are the first generation expected to do worse than our parents we are very susceptible to blindly believing the above statements. As an American black female with an array of ethnically and racially diverse friends and member of the social class for whom the recession had been present before if was officially titled — I feel confident in saying that it was not our brothers who put us in the present economic condition, but the few who used and continue to use our government as their personal profit-making tool.

1. What was the last positive thing you said about our University? Do you think people complain too much?
2. Do you remember multiculturalism? Do you care about multiculturalism?
3. When was the last time you studied, not crammed?
4. When was the last time you thanked a Food Services or Facilities Management employee?
5. When was the last time you wrote home?
6. How much do you drink alcohol per week? Does drinking affect your studies?
7. What are your campus concerns? How would you improve the campus?
8. Who will you vote for in the presidential election? Why?
9. Does campus diversity frighten you? Why or why not? Do you understand the diversity study?
10. What are your reflections on the Persian Gulf War? Was the United States justified with its military action?

Are the classes at Villanova challenging? Why or why not? What course would you add to the curriculum?

I find the courses here to be quite challenging because the professors not only expect you to learn but also to broaden your academic perspective. At this point I feel that my course of study is too singular. I would like to add a science.

My classes are very challenging and thought-provoking. If I could take another class it would be Art History class based at the Barnes Foundation.

I feel that for the majority of classes at Villanova you could just show up and do fine, although my grades do not show that. One thing this university does need is more creative writing courses.

Some of them are challenging. It depends on how interesting the course is. I would like to take a practical course in which you can put in practice what is told in the classroom. Practical in the sense of solving problems of real life.

Sure they are. I am an engineer and the new material takes a while to learn. I don't know enough about the entire University curriculum to make a good judgement. But I would take an architectural class if there was one.

Economics affect morality, family stability

By ELLEN GOODMAN

I suspected trouble when George Bush told a meeting of religious broadcasters, "We need a nation closer to the Waltons than the Simpsons." Until then, many families thought they were living in a depression, but they did not realize it was the president's plan.

Then came the State of the Union address and it was all clear. Yes, ma and pa, George-boy is leading us back through the haze of nostalgia to those wonderful years of the 1930s.

This is what he had to offer families. A "commission" on urban families. A bit of small change for the middle class. A touch of welfare-bashing for the poor. An invocation of Barbara as the mother-of-us-all: "When Barbara holds an AIDS baby in her arms and reads to children, she's saying to every person in this country 'family matters.' "

Proof that family matters to George? The two big items for the budget reflect the administration's belief that American families share the innocence of the Waltons and the math skills of Bart Simpson.

The highly touted $500 increase in the tax exemption for dependents would add $150 for the family of four in the 15 percent bracket and $280 for those in the 28 percent bracket. Not much, but like nearly everything else in the Bush budget, it gives more to the people who have more.

The cut in capital-gains taxes might actually help the Waltons — the cast now living on residuals in Beverly Hills. Sixty percent of the people who benefit from a capital-gains cut may earn less than $50,000 a year, as George claims. But two-thirds of the money goes to the wealthiest one percent. Even I can do those numbers and I was educated in American schools.

Running through the speech, I was struck by an utter disconnect between oratory and reality. It is if he met a New Hampshire family facing foreclosure and offered them hedge clippers. Or, rather, a tax deduction on hedge clippers.

But there was another disconnect, between morals and economics. When the president extolled the virtues of the Waltons, he was not thinking about their bank account but their moral strength.

Ask Americans to free-associate from the word "morals" and their linguistic path with range from sex to drugs, rock 'n roll, and blondes with black roots. They will not talk about economic policy and morality in one breath. Anyone who does so is accused of such retrograde things as fanning "class warfare."

In real life, economics has as much power to weaken the family as any internal moral corrosive.

Families in America are supposed to provide a haven in a heartless economy. They represent the private world inside a picket fence where our children are raised and instilled with values, as if immune from the outside.

On Walton Mountain, that 1970s fiction of the 1930s, the family grew stronger in tough times. In real life, economics has as much power to weaken the family as any internal moral corrosive.

There is an intricate and daily interaction between losing your job and losing your self-respect, losing your mortgage and your temper and your marriage — ask anyone who has been sucked into this black hole. But many Americans remain silent and embarrassed about this truth, convinced that any family failing is their own.

The most outrageous moment in the State of the Union speech came when the commander in chief of this economic disaster described the opponents of his capital-gains tax cut. "You kind of remind me of the definition of the Puritan," he said, "who couldn't sleep at night worrying that somehow, someone, somewhere was out having a good time." A good time? Is the problem envy? Or is it fairness?

There are honest differences about economic solutions. But the questions must involve more than numbers to be crunched. Economics is at root a matter of public morality, right and wrong.

Spare me the Waltons. Spare me the disabling fantasy that families grow stronger in hard times. An empty bank account is not a test of moral assets. Any leader who can look at family life in this economy, offer so little hope, and then accuse people of envy, deserves only one response in the voting booth: Good night, George-boy.

As college students, we spend most of our daily lives juggling classes, meetings, part-time jobs and homework. Long days and short nights find us wondering why we have no time to carry on the basic functions of life — sleeping, eating, breathing. So engrossed in preparing for the real world, we discover that it is passing us by as we carry on in the haven that is college.

Last week, President Bush delivered his State of the Union Address to members of Congress. The speech was televised on all major television networks as well as to local radio stations. How many of us heard what the president had to say? It seems that Villanova may need a new political group on campus. In addition to the College Republicans and Democrats, perhaps we should organize the College Political Apathy Club for those determined to shut out the real world.

Beginning with praises for the United States' efforts on the international scene (success in the Gulf War, the release of hostages), President Bush then tackled domestic issues in his address. Accused of pursuing national interests at the expense of affairs at home, Bush focused the remainder of his speech on the economy. He mentioned specific cuts in defense spending and requested Congressional support for various measures to stop unnecessary federal government spending. He also proposed means of keeping both interest rates and inflation down.

Bush proposed tax incentives for first-time home buyers and families with dependent children. Low-income families were assured of easier access to housing. Bush also urged reform in the health care industry and listed the negative aspects of a move toward socialized medicine.

But what does all this mean for the average student at Villanova? Did Bush say anything that directly touches our lives? How are we affected by this address?

One junior said that although she did not watch the address, she listened to radio reports the next day. "They reported that the speech was a great disappointment for the nation as a whole. I also know that the Democrats felt it was an empty rehash of old, impractical promises." When asked if the recession touched her personally, she said, "I feel that there is increased pressure on college students now. They need to find jobs soon after graduation in order to pay off loans. It's scary to recognize the state of the economy. I'm worried about finding a job — not necessarily a good one right away, just a job."

The search for employment after college seems to be a great concern for many students. While they may not feel the repercussions of the failing economy now, worries about the future are quite common to all. One graduate student said, "While I'm in school, my income from the University is fixed. I'm worried about finding a summer job, though, as well as employment when I'm finished with school. For now, I hope that

Midshipman tours in Japan

By GRETCHEN FISHER and PEGGY AGOLINO
Assistant Features Editors

When asked the inevitable question, "What did you do over summer break?" upon returning to Villanova, Alan Chace didn't need to respond with standard replies such as "Oh, just worked" or "Not too much." This senior spent his summer on the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps (NROTC) Japanese Foreign Exchange Cruise. Chace was selected along with one other midshipman selected from the Naval Academy to take part in a five-week Japanese tour that lasted from June 28 to Aug. 2.

The Navy sponsors trips to many different countries throughout the world. Chace, upon choosing Japan as his preference, was selected by the Navy after his interests in the country and reasons for participating in the program were discerned. Chace feels the strong recommendation he received from his Japanese professor Masako Hamada was, in addition to his minor in Japanese, the deciding factor in his acceptance.

> "The trip helped promote a better knowledge and understanding of our different cultures."

> Alan Chace

Chace spent the first three weeks at the Japanese Naval Defense Academy located just south of Tokyo. It is similar to the U.S. Naval Academy but also includes the Japanese army and air force. In addition to his naval activities, Chace attended many festivals and cultural parties, and stayed at the home of a lieutenant one weekend. During his free time, he tried his hand at some famous Japanese sports such as judo, kendeo and sumo wrestling. While an army contingent, stationed at the base, Chace joined them in climbing the famed Mt. Fuji.

Chace spent the last two weeks of the tour on the Japanese defense ship Haruna, which traveled to various ports along the Japanese coast. The atmosphere was one of comfortable rapport among the

Siblings arrive for weekend

By MAUREEN MEYER
Staff Reporter

Do not be alarmed if you see a lot of little kids running around on campus this weekend. Villanova is not being overrun by brilliant, juvenile Doogie Howsers. It is Sibling Weekend 1992. Siblings of 'Nova students, ages 5 to 13, are invited to spend the weekend at Villanova with their big brothers or big sisters. Together they will participate in the many activities planned by the Student Programming Council (SPC) along with some other campus organizations.

Jennifer DiObilda and Deirdre Healey are the co-chairs for event. They, along with their assistant chair, have put in many hours planning for the event. According to Healey, "We were interviewed for the job in October and after that we immediately began to interview people to be our assistant chairs. We have been planning for the event ever since."

Each of the assistant chairs were in charge of a certain aspect of the weekend. Beth Geiman and Mary Quigley organized registration, while Megan Reilly arranged the Mass. Publicity was taken care of by Nancy Guthro. Stephen Doyle and Patricia Donovan provided for entertainment, and meals were scheduled by Christine Horner.

The activities will begin tonight after registration. There is a carnival sponsored by Residence Life in the Belle Air Terrace, and Disney's movie, "The Rocketeer," is being shown in Connelly Center Cinema.

There are a variety of activities to choose from on Saturday, suitable for children of every age, and entertaining for Villanova students as well. After breakfast in one of the resident cafeterias, the Alumni gym will be open to everyone. Siblings may eat lunch in the cafeterias, and in the afternoon there are three bus trips planned. One trip takes visitors and students to the Franklin Institute, another travels to the Academy of Natural Sciences, and the Skatium in Ardmore is also an option. For those who choose to remain on campus, "101 Dalmatians" will play in Connelly Center, and volleyball, soccer and basketball will be held in the Jake Nevin Fieldhouse. Afterwards, there wil be a buffet dinner in the Villanova Room complete with a magician, a juggler and a clown. After dinner, the Association of

Student letters help prisoners

By AMY BUCCI
Staff Reporter

Amnesty International is not exactly a topic of conversation around the table in the Pit, yet the organization here at Villanova conquers injustice in the world every week. Amnesty International works to release "conscience prisoners" or people incarcerated because they have voiced or acted upon their opinions and beliefs. Amnesty International witnesses these unjust occurrences and attempts to use its own freedom to the advantage of the prisoners.

Each week Villanova receives a fax from Amnesty International headquarters which relays the details of a conscience prisoner's plight. The members of Amnesty International, under the guidance of Rebecca Schoenike, Jennifer Ehlers, Swata Ghandi and Janine Wingerter, then write letters to that prisoner's government seeking his or her release. This method may seem insignificant to many, but 1,000 prisoners are released each year, and Amnesty International believes letters from Villanova are partially responsible.

> For one hour of your free time, a person could receive a lifetime of freedom.

Amnesty International also circulates petitions here at Villanova, hoping each signature will bring prisoners closer to freedom. At "Cafe Innuendo," Amnesty International sponsored a speaker who was an actual released prisoner of conscience. All these activities are performed to increase student awareness about Amnesty International and to make everyone realize they can make a difference.

Amnesty International is located in the Center for Peace and Justice Education on the ground floor of Sullivan. Meetings are held to write letters every Wednesday at 5 p.m. Member Julie Ehlers describes her motivation: "I have more of an appreciation for my own rights as an American and more realization that not everyone has these rights, including free speech," said Ehlers. For one hour of your free time, a person could receive a lifetime of freedom. Our own Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. voiced the Amnesty International theme of "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere."

Khalir Kofi Asinor lives the double life of student and musician.

'Novan musician has rhythmic talents

By SUSAN BURNS
Staff Reporter

Khalir Kofi Asinor could easily be the "Clark Kent" of Villanova. When he leaves his desk in the Bursar's office at 5 p.m., he does not just go home to kick off his shoes and read the newspaper. Asinor becomes a wild man with a microphone, keeping the beat behind every percussion instrument ever imagined. He is a veritable drumming superman.

> Asinor exhibits styles ranging from jazz saxophone to jazz bagpipe, reggae to rhythm and blues and Latin jazz to party music.

"A lot of people notice that when I'm in my professional capacity, I am very much the professional. If you see me, I'm just a straight-up businessman," said Asinor, who functions as Student Accounts Coordinator at Villanova.

Seventeen years ago, Asinor, 38, found he possessed an innate talent for the percussion. He simply taught himself to play the conga, timbale and bongo. Since the first time his hands hit the beat, he has added about 40 different, smaller percussion instruments to his repertoire.

"I create my own instruments," Asinor said, "And I've become a flea market fanatic, because I'll use anything that makes noise." He even uses the "Garden Weasel," a gardening tool sold on television, during his concerts.

Performing and recording with many musicians, such as local star Bootsie Barnes and international artist Bobby Humphreys, Asinor exhibits styles ranging from jazz saxophone to jazz bagpipe, reggae to rhythm and blues and Latin jazz to party music.

Asinor confessed, however, that Latin jazz music is his one real love. "It moves me like a spirit from another life, so that I am sure that I lived before as a Latin musician. It warms me internally," he said.

Currently a free lance artist, he sometimes works with the Eddie Davis Orchestra, which appears at many wedding receptions, birthdays and other celebrations. He also has the opportunity to display two other talents — singing and songwriting.

During the band's show, Asinor slips out of the spotlight in his tuxedo. He reappears as "Special K," decked out in a cut-off Villanova tee-shirt, dark glasses, a funky hat and a whole new attitude. The crowd at every party

Villanova offers Minimester

By SCOTT M. SCHEIDT
Staff Reporter

Are you tired of watered-down news reports concerning the day's events in Washington from someone standing on the front lawn of the White House? Villanova's political science department is offering a three credit program called "Washington Minimester" to provide students with an escape from the "Headline News" whirlpool. This spring the program will invite students to hear for themselves what Congressional members, executive branch officials, media representatives, interest groups and many other government-related professionals have to say about the functions, politics and issues surrounding Congress.

The program starts May 10 and will continue through May 31, during which time Villanova students will live in the Washington area while attending a series of 36 seminars. In addition to the seminars, the Washington experience may also include lunches on Capitol Hill, night tours of Georgetown, time at Washington's many museums and cultural centers or standing in line to catch a special committee hearing.

Students of any major are invited to register for this very popular program. In the past, the Washington Minimester has involved many students from different majors such as commerce and finance, nursing, biology, English, history and art, as well as those from the political science department. All that is required is an interest in the daily workings of government.

This year's schedule of seminars includes a tour of the White House as well as many Congressional members discussing a variety of important topics. Some seminar subjects include "The Politics of Clean Air," "The Congressional Budget Process," "Black Voting Power," "Ethics in Lobbying," "The Politics of Gun Control," "U.S. Defense Policy" and "Drug Enforcement."

Dr. Jeffrey Hahn, of Villanova's political science department, will live with the students in Washington and accompany them throughout the program. Students in the program reside in the dormitories at American University, except for those who wish to live at home in the Capitol area. Very similar to Villanova's proximity to Philadelphia, American is situated in a suburban area at the edge of Washington, D.C.

Transportation to and from Washington must be arranged by each student. Once inside the city, students usually find the D.C. transit system convenient for their transportation needs, although students can bring and use their own cars.

Enrollment is limited to 20 students and done on a first-come, first-serve basis that requires a non-refundable $50 deposit by March 13. The program's popularity has unfortunately resulted in a filled 1992 roster even at this early date. Those interested in attending the 1993 Minimester program may seek further information at the political science department in Tolentine Hall.

President's message affects the lives of Villanovans my rent remains the same."

Some students readily accept the fact that jobs will be difficult to find. One junior knows that she faces a tough time ahead. "I need to seek other kinds of jobs or consider other choices like grad school or volunteering after college. But if I go to graduate school, the economy will still affect me. So many students are opting to pursue further education because they can't find jobs. It will be harder to get in," she said.

In terms of health care, one junior disagrees with Bush's condemnation of socialized medicine. "Today medicine is becoming more like a business. If people cannot afford to pay for services or if they do not have insurance, they cannot get medical care. For example, we spend so much money on neo-natal units in hospitals, but they go unused. If people can't pay, they don't get neo-natal care—no matter how necessary it is. The whole system seems to disregard the Hippocratic Oath," she said. She added that socialized medicine is the only solution to this problem.

Although most students admit to not hearing the State of the Union address, they do express concern for the future— both their own as well as that of the nation as a whole. While the president's speech urged us to pull together to strengthen the economy as we patriotically unified during the Gulf War, many see this as futile. "I think many Americans have a lack of confidence in national leaders," said one student.

In an election year, this address was a valiant attempt on the part of the president to muster support for his campaign. But we are left questioning whether this rhetoric will be enough to clinch the race in November and, more importantly, end the recession.

Besides worrying about their personal futures, many students expressed concern for the nation as a whole. "The whole thing is scary," said one junior. "I don't know if I'll have a job. It seems like our country is heading downhill. The traditional work ethic is decreasing. I think we are getting lazy. We have to work harder. We are being taken over by foreign countries like Japan."

two countries and many ranks present. Chace said that he and the other American midshipman had no serious duties while on board the ship, and stressed how accommodating and friendly the Japanese were while showing them what life was like on a Japanese naval ship.

Chace roomed with a senior Japanese midshipman during his stay. He explained how both nationalities were able to practice their foreign language skills by speaking the other's language. Chace, who after graduation hopes to become a Naval flight candidate, expressed his desire to return someday with the Navy to this country which he found so welcoming.

He defined his role on the trip as being similar to that of an ambassador, and praised the Navy for giving both countries the opportunity to develop a first-hand understanding and respect of each other. "I thought the Navy did a terrific job on the whole of promoting intercultural awareness. This trip helped promote a better knowledge and understanding of our different cultures. Exposing younger officers, the future leaders in the Navy, to other cultures will help them to have a better understanding when they are someday negotiating with other countries," said Chace.

Siblings may eat brunch in the resident cafeterias Sunday. Mass is planned for all participants in the Villanova Room and "101 Dalmatians" will play again in the afternoon.

"We tried to plan activities that would appeal to all ages so that there is something for everyone," said DiObilda. "And we really hope that everything runs smoothly," added Healey.

Nicole Lenti said of her 13-year-old brother, Craig, who will visit her this weekend, "He came last year and he had a good time. I think it is good for him to be able to see what college life is really like."

Khalir Kofi Asinor works in the Bursar's office by day but at night he becomes a "drumming superman."

Drummer discovers success in music goes wild when he performs his "hip hop" rap, which is dedicated to the guest of honor.

When Asinor first performed this segment of the show, he baffled many with his identity. "I became good friends with the guitar player in the band; I stood next to him and we joked around as we played our music. For the first three weeks that I sang my rap, though, he did not know it was me!" Asinor said, admitting that the rap, which takes him only five minutes to write, is the hit of every party.

The star enjoys his "alter ego" image, and prefers to call himself a "jack of all trades, master of diversity."

Life has indeed offered him a variety of opportunities. In the past, he has served in the Air Force Reserve, owned a trucking business, written greeting card messages and children's books, worked in a bank and taught martial arts.

Presently, Asinor is a communications major at Villanova focusing on public speaking and diction. He is training at a local radio station as an announcer, but is also looking to become a "voice-over" artist for cartoons, commercials and announcements.

He explained, "Many times the voice and the person you see on television are not the same ... I want to be the person to say, 'And now, it's Miller time.' "

With all that he has done, his love for percussion is constant. He admits that he will play the drums "until I can't lift my finger ... and then I may try with my feet."

Asinor always experiments with new activities. Looking back on his struggles to develop himself during his younger years, his one wish is that he had a mentor. "Despite these things I have been able to do, I never had a motivating factor in my life." He believes strongly in acting to make positive impacts on youths of all ages, on the street and even in his office at Villanova.

Khalir Kofi Asinor marches to the beat of his own drum. He wants all students to do the same. and says, "The only limits we have are those we place on ourselves. We must remove these and do other things."

Villanova Theatre features 'Well'

By VALERIE JOYCE
Staff Reporter

Quick, name the first three things that come to mind when you hear the name William Shakespeare. If "he's funny" was not among your top three answers, then you are not well enough acquainted with the Immortal Bard's plays. Luckily, a perfect opportunity to get to know one of them has arisen. The Villanova Theater brought Shakespeare's humor to campus as it opened its latest production, "All's Well That Ends Well," Feb. 5. This play is heralded as one of Shakespeare's most off-beat romantic comedies, incorporating love, war, nobility and sex in a very amusing fashion.

Villanova's lively production is directed by Roxanne Rix, who believes that "this is Shakespeare's most prescient play. Many of the characters seem more home in the 20th century than in the 17th." The play has been brought into the modern era with fantastic costumes by Austin K. Sanderson that look as though they are fresh from the pages of GQ and Rolling Stone. These two "looks" are used to represent the two different locales of the play, the court of Paris and the streets and battlefields of Florence, Italy. The play chronicles the journey of Helena, as she follows her love, Bertram, the Count of Rossillion, as he runs off to the Italian wars after being forced to marry her. The Villanova Theatre introduces students Anne Griffith and Peter Dubois in the roles of Helena and Bartram.

The production consists of a cast made up almost entirely of students from the University. Every role was played with great enthusiasm, even the actors that played minor roles each had their chance to shine, and shine they did. Some particularly good performances were those of Ray Saraceni as the King of France, Michael Friel as Lord Lafe and Jeri Smith playing the Countess' maid as well as Rynaldo, a possible suitor for Helena.

Two graduate student actors appear in the production, Rose Malague as the Countess, and Scott Langteau as Parolles, the devilish friend of Bartram's who does things with a cane that need to be seen to be fully appreciated. John M. Griffin also turns in a wonderfully amusing performance as Lavatch, the clown.

Overall, whether you are familiar with Shakespeare of seeing one of his plays for the first time, this production of "All's Well That Ends Well" is worth seeing. The show runs Wednesdays through Sundays from Feb. 5 through 16 in Vasey Theatre.

Zappa continues his quest for respect

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Dweezil Zappa spoke to David J. Criblez in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Dweezil Zappa. The man with the name nobody can spell. Affectionately, the Dweez. His musical talents and comic prowess combine to create his signature style that evokes images of his papa, Frank Zappa, yet he has an edge. Dweezil is a part of the new guitar hero generation. With the teachings of Steve Vai (Vai was Frank's guitarist), friendships with Zakk Wyde (Ozzy Osbourne) and Nuno Bettencourt (from Extreme, also his producer) and the inspiration of Edward Van Halen and the late Randy Rhodes, how can you go wrong? However, Dweezil is his own individual. His songwriting has strenghtened and his performances have become lethal proving he is more than just a unibrow with a cute smile.

VILLANOVAN: You have been a recording artist for five years now. How do you view your progression from your first LP, Havin' A Bad Day to your latest LP, Confessions?

ZAPPA: "Just listening to the stuff there's a maturity in the music. I've also become more comfortable playing the guitar. I'm continuing to expand on different elements. Nothing sounds alike, they are completely different beasts. Confessions is my favorite. We're starting another LP this month and it will kick the hell out of Confessions!"

V: Simply listening to Confessions the humor on it makes it shine. Is the humor intentionally implemented or does it flow naturally?

Z: "Both. If you're not having fun, it does not do anything, for me especially. You can play serious music, too, but there still must be an element of enjoyment. The people I play with are talented and diverse in their personalities. You put us all together and its pretty ... it's a madhouse, really."

V: Speaking of humor, what made you cover the 70's disco hit, "Staying Alive" and get Donny Osmond on vocal?

Z: "I thought it was a pretty funny sound to record to heavy metal. When that song first came out people dug it. Then a couple of years later they were saying (in an embarrassed voice) 'I can't believe I liked that song.' I wanted to make people legitimately like the song and still have fun with it. Originally Ozzy Osbourne sang it, but his record company would not let me release it. So I went from the Ozzman to an Osmond."

V: You also cover the Beatles. "Anytime At All," was that just a tune that you enjoyed jamming?

Z: "Well ... it's something I always liked. No one ever covered it. It struck a chord in my ear. I enjoyed updating it ever so slightly. I added the 12 string and a little distortion."

V: On all three of your albums you have a message concerning different social issues. Are these issues that move you at all?

Z: "They are observations. But the one that strikes a chord and really hits home is the song 'Earth.' You can just look around you. Look at the pollution, the weather's changing, you get sick more often and it's due to no other reason then all the environmental nightmares that have been happening. People just forget, this is the only place we have to live. We got too comfortable with being a disposable society."

V: Has your father influenced you in any respect?

Z: "He definitely influences me and more as I get older. You have to be musically competent in order to make musical jokes. The older I get, the more stupidity I can involve myself with. He produced my first record. The next LP will feature even more quirks along those lines.

V: Your family appears to have an incredible bond. What makes the family so unique and the individuals in it?

Z: "I don't know, man. We just got lucky I guess. Every family has a sense of what is normal. We're ... pretty weird."

V: Your brother Ahmet sings on Confessions. What made you stay so close to home?

Z: "Being that you have to spend a lot of time with your singer, I wanted somebody who I would get along with and performance wise he's got a lot of energy, he's a freak ringleader. We do a thing called Nelson Phillips, our little tribute to both those groups ... in the finest way. Plus we do a medley of 122 70's songs in 18 minutes. It gets hairy. We're basically buffoons."

V: Do you enjoy singing?

Z: "I hate singing. I did it 'cause I had to. I'd rather focus on the guitar. I want to be considered a musician, basically. The guitar is just the instrument of choice."

V: Instrumental pieces such as "Electric Hoedown" and "Obviously Influenced By the Devil" evoke Eddie Van Halen and Steve Vai. Was this your aim?

Z: "Well, 'Hoedown' is influenced by Eddie's 'Cathedral' ... in the biggest way. Edward's my super hero. The guy's the best. I listen to everything he does. He could do anything and I'd be like, 'That's the coolest thing in the world.' Steve showed me the basics right down to how to hold a pick. I also love Randy Rhodes. I have been fortunate to play with some of my biggest influences too."

V: What were you working on when you were young?

Z: "I was a total metalhead. All I wanted to know was Ozzy and Van Halen. That's all I did since I was 12, listen to records and play 10, 12 hours a day. Without any formal training."

V: How would you define your guitar style?

Z: "I'm just as sloppy as I am accurate. There's precision and there's comedy. It is rock guitar at its worst and at its finest."

V: You were on MTV at one time as a veejay and you were very successful and popular. What made you leave?

Z: "I never really set my sights on doing that. I was a goof. I only did it for 12 weeks. It was a thing that I walked away from. It was a hinderance in a way because that is how I stick in people's minds. Its hard to be taken seriously after that."

V: You also have had a rather public romantic life in the tabloids.

Soundtrack offers talent

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Movie soundtracks are often excellent music compilations containing otherwise unavailable gems from diverse recording artists. German film director Wim Wenders has achieved such a successful collection with the musical companion to his newest project, "Until the End of the World."

The film, under construction since the mid-'80s, focuses on life and love in the frightening shadow of a nuclear apocalypse in 1999. Wenders, a former music critic, gave participating musicians a vague description of the plot so that the songs would neither be theme-obsessed nor overly contrived. The result is a surprisingly unified selection of high quality creations.

Enlisting some of the biggest names in modern rock and progressive music, Wenders gathered an array of tunes which have an overall surreal, imaginative quality compatible with the futuristic nature of the story. The Talking Heads' "Sax and Violins" is outstanding as a showcase for David Byrne's liquid, rubber-band voice, which is set against the odd backdrop of cowbells. R.E.M.'s contribution "Fretless" focuses on Michael Stipe's vocals with subtle piano and guitar melodies and faint drums. Although the band is joined by the B52's Kate Pierson singing backup, the spotlight is on Stipe.

Wender's experience as director of U2's "Night and Day" video allowed him to ask the band to sing the title track of the disc. The song is superior to some of the tracks of Achtung Baby with emphasis on the Edge's untouchable guitar arrangements. U2 producer Daniel Lanois also offers his own song, "Sleeping in the Devil's Bed," which provides unexpectedly good, husky vocals and rippling synthesizer beats. Julee Cruise's "Summer Kisses, Winter Tears," which was co-produced by David Lynch, brings the haunting Twin Peak's theme to mind and is thus an appropriate choice since Lynch has become a paragon of postmodern imagery.

Depeche Mode also gives a superior performance with "Death's Door," a combination of carnival music echoes and heartbeat-like sounds. "Last Night Sleep" by Can centers around tropical, luring drumbeats. All the tracks are nicely tied together by the cello instrumental pieces by David Darling which are enchanting, serenely sweet and melodic. Elvis Costello's version of the Kinks' song "Days" falls short of its potential as do mediocre songs by Nick Cave and Lou Reed, although the overall effect of the disc is laudable.

Wenders has scored a hit with this all-star lineup and it will be a difficult for the film to match the quality of its soundtrack.

Ozzy recaptures his throne as metal's king

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"Remember the motto, the crazier you go, the crazier I go . . . Let the madness begin," declared John Osbourne, the prince of darkness, a.k.a. Ozzy. Stripped down to a slim build, Ozzy returned to the Tower Theater for a double-header homecoming Jan. 29 and 30.

Ozzy endeared himself to Philadelphia back in 1989 when he played a gig at the Tower after already successfully selling out the Spectrum in December of 1988. His love for theaters grew due to the closeness with the people and the character the building adds to the show that hockey rinks lack.

The crowd was pre-pumped by roaming video cameras, a picture booth with cardboard cuts of Ozzy, Ozzy's girl-models who handed out condoms saying, "Ozzy wants you to play it safe," a short pre-show film on Ozzy's career and an introduction by MTV's metalman, Rikki Rachtman. However this was not necessary, simply Ozzy's presence was enough to gather up a thunderball of energy that made his "Theater of Madness" take off.

With the blistering openers of "Bark at the Moon," "Desire" and "Mr. Crowley," Ozzy proved he has not lost his charge as he leaped and jumped all over the stage. He is a man who likes to get his hands dirty. He dumps numerous buckets of water on the audience and himself, takes off his shoes and shirt and gets down to it.

"Are there any Black Sabbath fans here?" pokes the Oz. After mooning the audience, in a distasteful manner, Ozzy peered back into the history books playing, "Snowblind" and the haunting, "War Pigs."

Guitarist Zakk Wylde and drummer Randy Castillo have just begun to mesh with Ozzy. Their sound has molded Oz's music to the point where it is keeping him alive. Both men soloed with pure vigor and gumption that shattered the audience's expectations.

An ode to deceased axeman/guitar god, Randy Rhodes, was in order as Ozzy and Company swayed to the melodic poetry of "Goodbye to Romance."

"I'll do one more song but you have to promise me that you'll go absolutely extra, extra crazy," claimed Ozzy, "O.K.? . . . All Aboard!" The classic metal anthem, "Crazy Train," tied up all the audience's energy into a tornado that spun about the Tower.

Ozzy is, without a doubt, a man possessed. Possessed not by the devil, but by his own audience. He loves his fans with deep sincerity and he feeds off their energy. It is not about bat heads, killing doves or Satantic messages. It's about the sharing between a man and his fans. No matter how . . . sick.

Ozzy played a double-header at the Tower Jan. 29 and 30.

SET LIST: "Bark at the Moon," "Desire," "Mr. Crowley," "I Don't Know," "Snowblind," "Goodbye to Romance," "I Don't Want to Change the World," "Shot in the Dark," "No More Tears," "Miracle Man," "War Pigs," "Suicide Solution" and "Paranoid."

'Shepherd Moons' transcends bounds

Shepherd Moons

By JOHN KAZMIERCZAK
Staff Reporter

The most eloquent statement made about the unique style of music on Enya's latest album, Shepherd Moons, is the number of locations at which it can be found in different music stores. Some display it on the Top 40 rack, some in the New Age section and some categorize it as Easy Listening.

Enya produces her evocative (and apparently unclassifiable) works by combining intricate keyboard arrangements with ethereal, hymn-like vocals. Not content to be bound by the linguistic preconceptions and colorations that hinder traditional lyrics, Enya performs over half of Shepherd Moons pieces in Gaelic. Because there are no complex lyrical workings to decipher, listeners regard her singing as part of the music rather than as a separate entity. The unification of vocals and instrumental performances adds much to the listening experience.

Simplicity is the trademark of this album. Most songs feature minimal background, usually only one instrument such as a cornet or clarinet. In this simplicity lies the beauty of her work, for Enya can do so much with so little. "Book of Days," the album's most stirring track, achieves its driving undertone and lofty melody using only vocals, organ and almost nonexistent percussion. The soothing effect present in many songs, especially in "Angeles" and "No Holly For Miss Quinn," is another result of her music's instrumental minimalism.

Listeners regard her singing as part of the music, rather than a separate entity.

Unfortunately, the interdependence between vocals and keyboards had a downside as well. A notably weak and unoriginal backing on "Marble Halls" leaves the high vocal arrangment without any support, unbalancing a potentially good song. Similar weak spots are present in "How Can I Keep From Singing?" and "Shepherd Moons," but these are not as conspicuous.

In comparison to her last album, Watermark, in which "Orinoco Flow," was featured, Shepherd Moons is more refined but lacks some of the vitality of its predecessor. Still, with its deceptively smooth melodies and cool, elegant vocals, this album is sure to be a winner.

Zappa

How did you cope with that pressure?

Z: "I learned not to tell anyone . . . anything."

V: Apparently the last time you were in Philly, a disaster occurred. What happened?

Z: "We were at the TLA. My guitar system blew, losing sound for twenty minutes, my brother lost his voice, the band playing was Butthole Surfers. We played a mostly instrumental set and we were not well-rehearsed. The transitions were screwed. But we turned it into a really relaxed night. It was fun though."

V: Will you continue to tour behind Confessions?

Z: "We can't . . . it's become too expensive.

V: Would you consider doing a solo instrumental album?

Z: "Umm . . . Yeah but it would probably have other stuff then myself. I'd invite guests to play on it. It would not just be a strict guitar solo LP. It would be filled with twisted band arrangements. I don't like guitar solo albums, they are too over done these days."

V: Do you see a lot of bands?

Z: "Not really, to be honest I hate going out. I don't feel comfortable anywhere but my own house. We have a recording studio in the basement. My dad is usually down there. But I usually rehearse and rehearse. I listen to everything though. I mean . . . I listen to the Bulgarian Women's Choir. I'm going to record some of their stuff for the next LP. Serious . . . I know I'm pretty screwed."

Liza Minnelli returns to the spotlight

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Liza Minnelli. Liza with a Z. The Z is obviously for zest. The shadow that her mother, Judy Garland ("The Wizard of Oz"), cast over her has not tainted her in any way. It has made her push and work harder for her own individuality. Her success is not only phenomenal, but it's a pleasure to watch. Liza's "Stepping Out At Radio City" is a slice of real entertainment from a true entertainer.

A blank stage with a mere spotlight was enough for Liza to fill the first act alone. Dressed simply in a white bob dress, she made the bare stage seem full and vibrant. Her personality is her key. It's an entity in itself. From the comical and tender opening "Nearness of You," to the starry "Teach Me Tonight" and the awe inspiring, "So What?" from her film "Cabaret," Liza supported her sparkle with talent.

By far the most touching segment of the first act was her endearing tribute to her father, Vincente Minnelli. To the tune of "Seeing Things," she spoke of the relationship they had and his astonishing theater accomplishments as, surprisingly enough, Radio City's art director in the mid to late thirties (1933-37). Throughout this tribute a large picture frame showed numerous slides of Vincente and his talented daughter.

Dressed in a white blouse, tight black pants and a slit skirt, Liza showed off her new trim figure while jamming on "Losing My Mind." This showy number was merely an appetizer for a set that wouldn't let up.

"Meet My Demon Divas," stated Liza. "They are all my dear friends." Dubbed "Liza and Friends," Act II featured a supercharged Liza with a cast of 13 women of all types, sizes and ages. A "Men" medley ("It's Raining Men"/"Mr. Sandman"/"Just Like a Man," etc.) was whipped up by this powerful team backed by a full house orchestra nestled in white podiums.

Through tap numbers, tributes to Bob Fosse and Fred Ebb and even a tribal-like drum solo, compliments of the Divas, Liza drove the show to an high energy plateau. She even sprinkled the set with short cute comedy routines.

"The best part about my life . . . has been the friendships I've been blessed to be a part of," gasped Liza between numbers. Her honesty and joy of performing is the essence of her unique style that everyone adores. She displayed these characteristics in her "New York, New York" finale. After a standing ovation and constant cheering the audience was not only pleased but overwhelmed. For one night a little Italian spitfire knocked New York off its feet.

'Shining' lacks spirit

By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

Lest we forget that the Nazi threat once cast its ignominious shadow across the face of the world, "Shining Through" revives old film reels of high-stepping Nazi regiments in blazing color. The furor and splendor created by the Third Reich is hauntingly recaptured. After the fall of the Soviet Union, our only modern equivalent seems to be Japanese legislators calling American workers "lazy" and "unmotivated." Hardly the stuff from which Hollywood "good versus evil" tales can be spun.

Set in the midst of World War II, "Shining Through" contains international intrigue, spies galore, a classic love story and the threat of world destruction. Sound familiar? This same premise has been recycled in about a thousand movies, but does "Shining Through" invent a new twist for a tired story?

Melanie Griffith returns as another working girl, this time as Linda Voss, a bright, bilingual secretary who always speaks her mind. Her new boss, Ed Leland (Michael Douglas) is a tight-lipped lawyer who appears miserably detached. Almost immediately, she warms his temperament with her candid observations and quick wit. They soon become lovers, only to be torn apart by the war.

Up to this point, the movie handles its plot with genuine energy. Griffith and Douglas find an entertaining on-screen chemistry that soon gets lost among the film's numerous sub-plots.

Among these distractions are Griffith's family, part Irish-American and German Jew, and the Jewish relatives that are hiding in war-torn Germany. It is revealed that Douglas is actually a high-ranking OSS officer, and he becomes too involved in his activities to pay her any attention. As she bravely enters Nazi Germany as an undercover agent, the movie takes a decidedly different turn.

Griffith's character also seems to undergo a transformation that her acting ability cannot match. As an engaging secretary, Griffith earns well-deserved praise, but as in international spy, she could use some voice lessons. Her soft-spoken demeanor and warm smile seem out of place among stiff Nazi officers and bombing raids. The rapport between Griffith and Douglas disappears with Douglas' sparse appearances, and their final dramatic scene is painfully forced.

"Shining Through" is a mild-mannered film in a genre that demands suspense and action to be tempered by a forceful emotional response. A more definable turn must be viewed in Griffith's portrayal, one which never develops. Perhaps the wiry Michele Pfeiffer or the unpredictable Sean Young might have carried off the part with more conviction.

FAST FORWARD: Some promising suspense thrillers are on their way to local theaters. "Final Analysis" stars Richard Gere as a psychiatrist who falls in love with his patient. An explosive love triangle soon develops between Gere, and his married client (Kim Basinger), and her sister (Uma Thurman). "Final Analysis" premeires at the end of February.

"Basic Instinct," another Michael Douglas thriller, has a possible fresh tact on the serial killer theme. Douglas plays a detective investigating a strange rash of male deaths. Turns out the culprit is a fanatical lesbian group, fed up with men, that roams the city seducing and eventually exterminating them.

REWIND: Spike Lee's interracial hit, "Jungle Fever," finds its way to America's VCR's. In one of his most controversial films, Lee examines the explosive tension between blacks and whites, both among individuals and within society. Its stark pessimism may turn off the casual viewer, but it is worth a view.

"Regarding Henry" stars Harrison Ford as a greedy yuppie lawyer who injures his head in a shooting, loses his memory, and then becomes a warm, sensitive human being. Just because Ford's character can now love puppies and appreciate his family does not mean the audience learned anything. "Regarding Henry" appears to be lost in the same dazed dreamworld of its amnesia patient. Annette Bening plays Ford's pampered wife, but the film never really takes off.

CLIPS: Villanova's Cultural Film Series features "The Makioka Sisters," a 1983 Japanese film that has been called an Asian "Pride and Prejudice," and is set in World War II, Japan. "The Makioka Sisters" will play in the Connelly Center Cinema Feb. 7 at 8 p.m., Feb. 9 at 3:30 and 7 p.m., and Feb. 10 at 7 p.m.

Scatterbrain comes alive

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

ROCK QUARRY

Scatterbrain's Scamboogery sounds like an amusement park ride at Six Flags, but in reality it is much more electrifying. This band is not your average everyday hairy, lip-sticked gang o'thugs. They are mutts of an odd breed. Their comical play on music is quite extraordinary and makes them stand out, like neon green in a plaid factory.

Scamboogery is only the second offering from these madmen. Their first independently labeled LP. Here Comes Trouble faired well in a sagging market, spawning underground hits "Don't Call Me Dude," "I'm With Stupid" and "Down With the Ship." This was only a taste of what was to come.

Lead singer Tommy Christ, a cross between Joe Walsh and Alice Cooper, takes on all responsibility. Where Anthrax loses their flavorful personality into speed metal, Scatterbrain picks up by lowering the pace just enough to get the punchlines.

What other band would sing songs with titles like, "Tastes Just like Chicken" and "Grandma's House of Babes" and then lead into Mozart's Sonata #11 (Rondo Alla Turka)? Guitarist Paul Nieder takes this classical piece to the hilt and makes it his own as his high-pitched scales run wild.

Both "Logic" and "Down the Road (Rock-n-Roll Ain't Pretty)" signify Scatterbrain's central core which is playful lyrics, a funk backseat with metal riffs and most importantly, a goofy grin.

Metalmen are easier to take and make more sense when they act out the actual parodoxical life that they lead. Scatterbrain is just that. The funny thing is amongst all the other groups, the rest look like . . . clowns.

Eddie Money, once Eddie Mahoney, has come to a standstill. His career as a vocalist flourished in the late seventies, then boomeranged to the mid-'80s only to stagnate in the '90s.

Right Here presents Money at a crossroads, not knowing which way to turn or go. Part of this indecision can be seen through his various run-throughts of producers: Monty Byrom, Keith Olsen, Randy D. Jackson and Marc Tanner. His long time producer and friend, Richie Zito (who recently produced the Cult's new LP, Ceremony) is desperately missing.

The album begins with a strong Olsen-produced track, "Heaven in the Back Seat," which is fun music made to be played while gazing in the mirror combing your hair on Friday night. But it is immature for Money. Should he be singing about back-seat love at his age? C'mon, leave it for Bon Jovi, Ed.

The middle is merely a muddle of wasteful tunes with some faint ideas that virtually lead to nowhere. "Another Nice Day in L.A." is literally the twin of Randy Newman's "I Love L.A." Plus he even copies himself on the lathargic, "Fire and Water" evoking his late-eighties hit, "Walk on Water."

"She Takes My Breath Away" has some original accoustic rythms but loses ground after the first couple of bars. "Fall in Love Again" is another instrumentation problem as the simplistic yet harmonious synth and guitar licks override Money's voice.

The closing cap on Here is a near-perfect contemporary ballad, "I'll Get By," also produced by Olsen. Money finally hits it right, as the credits begin to roll. Its sensitivity and emotion reflect the real man inside of Money's pre-pubestant cover-coating.

Money has potential, whether he uses it is another case in itself. His lack of direction is blatant through the patchworking results of four different producers, Olsen being the only sincere effort. Mr. Money must look in the mirror and ask himself, 'what am I trying to say here?' He is quickly losing his sense of communication with the public. He had better hurry before he loses his fans.

SINGLE SPOTLIGHT: The Four Horsemen's third single, "Tired Wings," is on par with Aerosmith. Their grungy guitar and cackling vocals, courtesy of Frank Starr (the man who told Axl Rose he would never be anything) makes them the best new band around. One listen to their LP, Nobody Said It Was Easy and you will forget Nirvana.

PEBBLES: John Mellencamp is putting together a video documentary along with a 4-CD set entitled, Nothing Like We Planned. The set will contain unreleased songs, past hits, live cuts and special versions of his past songs. Mellencamp has a movie opening this month entitled, "Falling From Grace." He both stars in and directs the film. He also gave rapper Marky Mark permission to remake " Jack and Diane."

'Brothers K' pits brother against brother

By VALERIE JOYCE
Staff Reporter

The Arden Theater Company greets 1992 with the exciting world premiere of "The Brothers K.," based on the legendary novel "The Brothers Karamazov" by Fyodor Dostoyevsky. Adapted and directed by Arden founders, Terrence J. Nolen and Aaron Posner, this tale's extraordinary transformation from the page to the stage is the most ambitious project in the Arden's history.

"Ever since Terry and I met nine years ago," says Posner, "we've talked about how theater, literature, passion, God and faith come together in an amazing book called "The Brothers Karamazov." We always felt that the story belonged on the stage and we're delighted that the Arden is the means to get it there."

The Brothers Karamazov" is a masterpiece of greed, betrayal, lust and patricide. Fyodor Karamazov's obsession for his son's lover results in brutal murder. A dramatic and suspenseful trial enues, pitting emotion against reason, intellect against faith, brother against brother. Dostoyevsky's novel was published in 1880. At the time of his death the following year, Dostoyevsky was universally acknowledged as one of Russia's greatest writers.

The Arden's entertaining production is surprisingly only a three-hour evening. Twelve actors introduce the town, circumstances and the people of the Karamazov clan. The cast includes Arden veterans such as Robert Cristophe, who plays the oldes Karamazov son Dmitri; Grace Gonglewski as the harlot who steals men's hearts with a practiced hand; and H. Michael Walls, who pulls triple duty as the infuriating Fyodor, an entertaining Devil and the prosecuting attorney. Talented newcomers to the Arden fill out the cast, and Orest Artimew on violin creates an authentically Slavic background for the entire show. As director Nolen explains, "It is a deeply passionate, deeply spiritual story that struggles with the major dilemmas that confront us all."

The Arden Theater Company successfully tranforms 'The Brothers Karamazov' from the page to the stage.

The set, consisting of different layered platforms, ramps and poles, created by David Slovic, lends itself both to the acrobatic Russian dancing as well as the climactic trial scene. The costumes by Tracy D'Altilia also create a Russian reality all their own.

"The Brothers K." runs from Jan. 16-Feb. 16 at St. Stephen's Alley Performing Arts Centre at 10th and Ludlow streets (between Chestnut and Market) in Center City.

FREEJACK: Emilio Estevez is miscast as a racecar driver thrust into the future to contend with a bounty hunter, played by scene-stealing Mick Jagger. The plot does not live up to its potential and wastes the talent of Anthony Hopkins, giving him little dialogue. C

GRAND CANYON: Focusing on the anxieties of the 40-something generation in Los Angeles, this Lawrence Kasdan film is a follow-up to "The Big Chill." The cast is strong featuring Kevin Kline, Danny Glover, and Steve Martin in a story which causes self-reflection by the audience. B-

THE HAND THAT ROCKS THE CRADLE: Rebecca De Mornay is every parent's worst nightmare as a psychotic babysitter who uses psychological terrorism to take control of a family and turn them against their mother. B-

Dead CD combines talent

By MAURA RURAK
Assistant Entertainment Editor

"I first saw the Dead in '72, 40-odd miles from Liverpool, while standing in a foot of mud among a small, sodden horde who braved the swamp in the front of the stage ... If we had been extras in a terrible remake of 'Henry V,' we would have been the French after the battle."

In his own imaginative words, Elvis Costello recounts his youthful experiences with the legendary band, The Grateful Dead. Along with other talented artists such as Suzanne Vega, the Indigo Girls, Lyle Lovett, Cowboy Junkies and Midnight Oil, Costello is part of a compilation that honors the mystical, magical Dead on "Deadicated."

Each artist was given the opportunity to choose their favorite Dead tune so that they could pay tribute to the band. Jane's Addiction decided to do "Ripple" because "this song meant a lot to me when I was too young (but trying) to grow facial hair, smoking too much pot and contemplating teen suicide," said lead singer Eric A. Dwight Yaokam performs "Truckin" since he believes it is "an off-handed anthem of resilience. Everytime I hear, and now perform 'Truckin,' I'm still infatuated with the ideals and dreams of the generation that took us on that long, strange trip ..."

Perhaps one of the most interesting features of the CD is the inside coverslip filled with the original lyrics of the songs performed and an in depth outline on what each person can do to save the rainforests. It is important to note that a significant portion of the proceeds made from this album are going to the Rainforest Action Network and Cultural Survival based in San Francisco.

The Grateful Dead is a band that has influenced thousands of young performers and millions of people. Even so, they are often overlooked by the industry as a driving force in the entertainment market. "Deadicated" is hoping to bring back some of the credit due to both past and present members of the Dead. Wrote Ralph Sall and Roy Lott, "The Dead are about freedom and everyone's right to dream his own version of the American Dream."

It is impossible to do justice to classic tunes by the Dead. However, each artist on "Deadicated" has interpreted the songs in a respectful manner and, as always, the spirit of the Dead lives on.

Wine bottles and Rival Sons jam at Cabaret

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Presented by the Committee for Progressive Music, the Winebottles will perform Tuesday nights during February at the 23 East Cabaret. The band formed at the University of Colorado at Boulder in 1988 when lead singer Doug Murray, who had attended Villanova his freshman year, and guitarist Darren Taylor were students there. After touring for a while with the Samples, they have returned to their Philadelphia-area roots and are gaining local popularity, having charted at No. 35 on WXVU's Jan. 24 alternative band list. The Winebottles have an unusual sense of humor, singing a song about the murder of Fred the Fish, and a big heart, dedicating their first album to a deceased dog named Greta. Both elements combine to produce reflective and thought-provoking tunes. They have described their music as "exhilarating, electrifying, psychedelic slam jam polka ska for the head."

The Winebottles' sound is perfect for college radio, featuring refreshing and original lyrics courtesy of Murray. Kurt Junker's steady back beat is orbited by the airy guitar work of Darren Taylor and Jason Altemose to form tranquil melodies like "Little Girl," which is similar to The Ocean Blue's sound.

Certain songs indicate R.E.M. influences, such as Stipe-like moans on "My Government" and resonant vocal harmonies on "Ohio." "Fish Story" is a harmonica-laden track in the unconventional humorous style of Camper Van Beethoven and is also reminiscent of the B52's animal ode, "Quiche Lorraine." The echoing bird effects of the Cure's "Like Cockatoos" are paralleled by "Mark's Nightmare," which overflows with haunting background voices.

> The Winebottles' sound is perfect for college radio, featuring refreshing and original lyrics courtesy of Murray.

The Winebottles blend these influences from other progressive artists to create colorful and distinctive musical patterns with a unique character of their own. Their talent, combined with imaginative lyrics and a high degree of good looks give the Winebottles significant potential as a live act.

COURTESY OF RED GARAGE MANAGEMENT

The Winebottles combine refreshing original lyrics and influences from many progressive artists.

FLASH: The Philadelphia based Rival Sons will be jamming at the 23 East Cabaret on Feb. 5 and 12, uniting powerful rock with smooth jazz tones. The band boasts technical education with guitarist. Rick Beato, a professor of jazz at Ithaca College. Forceful and hard-driving drum beats by J.J. Zeller ignite their songs which combine David Rolfe's blaze of guitar riffs with flickering vocals by bassist Allan Blair. The Rival Sons have a reputation for an exciting and energetic stage presence, which complements their soulful and honest style.

Critically acclaimed guitarist Vinnie Moore will perform at the Chestnut Cabaret on Feb. 13. Promoting his newest and strongest release, Meltdown, Moore will push his acoustical genius to its limits on these bold and expansive tracks. Moore is known currently for his work as lead guitarist on Alice Cooper's tour and has been included among the ranks of string masters Joe Satriani and Steve Vai.

DON'T TREAD ON ME

In honor of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday last Jan. 15, V.E.G. has decided to dedicate this page of "Don't Tread on Me" to peoples of color working for a better environment.

"Don't Tread On Me" is a newly created section of The Villanovan. It hopes to bring the concerns for the safety of the planet to the University Community. We hope to achieve awareness and action through education. If you would like to participate in the production of this page, please leave your name and number as well as your interest on a recycled piece of paper on the V.E.G. board in the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Recognizing Environmental Diversity

By MEGAN O'DONNELL
Senior Reporter

When one thinks of environmental concerns, the first issues that come to mind are whales, the rainforest, the ozone layer or waste management. And when one thinks of the stereotypical environmentalists, one might envision a tall man with a bear and a flannel shirt pulling up his waders while chained to an old growth tree. The initial issues are indeed environmental ones and some environmentalists do indeed resemble Grizzly Adams. However, there is another movement struggling for distinct environmental concerns and it is not as homogenous as one would assume.

The environmental movement has commonly been perceived as an all-white, middle-class occupation. With the exception of groups such as Earth First!, the race to save the planet is a largely conservative and politically moderate one. The 10 major environmental organizations are concerned primarily with leisure and recreation, wildlife and wilderness preservation, resource conservation and industry regulation, and their own constituents are as white as can be.

None of the top leaders on this gang of 10 is of African, Latino, Asian or Native American descent. Of 315 staff members of the National Audubon Society, only three are black. Friends of the Earth's staff of 40 includes five minority workers, while the Natural Resources Defense Council has five minority professionals among its staff of 140. The Sierra Club's 250-member staff includes one Latino but no blacks or Asians among its professionals. Is the environmental movement exclusionary? Do people of color not care about their surroundings? Or is a concerted effort being made to address another focus?

In reality, many local and environmental organizations whose members are often those directly exposed to environmental threats, are led by blacks, Hispanics and women. These are the groups that address the problems in the environment of the nation's racially segregated cities, in deteriorating urban infrastructures and hazardous industrial workplaces.

. . . the efforts of those working towards immigrant rights, affordable housing, hazards in the workplace and municipal service delivery go largely unreported.

Historically, peoples of color have sought to rectify the situation between themselves and their environments. Considering the background of the members of the large national organizations, it can be concluded that perhaps Caucasians have a more global perspective than anybody else. This is a limited view. The environment is a single-interest issue — one that should be the concern of anyone who breathes — and is promoted not by a homogeneous group but by all races. This seems only logical considering the immediate risks often are found in communities of color.

Research conducted over the past decade has proven a disproportionate number of African, Asian, Latino and Native Americans reside in communities of health-threatening toxic environments and substances. The levels of exposure of these communities are extremely high in comparison with the hazards faced by the rest of the population in the United States . This is a phe nomenon known as disproportion ate risk.

Today, the environmental movement enjoys great exposure within the spectrum of political activism in the United States. Groups like the Sierra Club and National Wildlife Federation control budgets of millions of dollars and hundreds of thousands members, even millions. While the efforts of such groups are widely reported and lauded, the efforts of those working toward immigrant rights, affordable housing, hazards in the workplace and municipal service delivery go largely unreported. If the '90s are indeed to be the decade of the environment, perhaps the two sides can come together in unity.

Putting it back

By TAMMY BERRY
Assistant Reporter

In 1988, the federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) estimated that 14,000 landfills, roughly 70 percent of the landfills in this country, have closed since 1978. The Agency then estimated that within the next 20 years only 1,200 landfills will remain open. When you consider that as a nation we produce 180 million tons of solid waste a year, the rapid disappearance of our landfills should worry you. However, there is an alternative to discarding all of our solid waste in landfills. According to the EDF letter, the Environmental Defense Fund is advocating "clean" composting: separating and composting organic material that is not recyclable, thereby providing efficient, quality soil product — as opposed to mixed-waste composting. Whether it is done through organized facilities or by private individuals, every bit of composting diverts waste from our disappearing landfills. Now is the time to start taking precautions before our landfills are all full and it is too late to take action. This alternative is composting which can be done on either a large or small scale.

Composting is a way of controlling and accelerating the natural process by which microbes break down organic materials so that the materials may be returned to the soil and reused. A balance is formed between carbon, nitrogen, heat, air and moisture which creates populations of fungi, bacteria, protozoa and tiny invertebrates that work together in breaking down the organic material. This microbial activity can also break down toxins and pesticides and conquer soil-born diseases. As a result microorganisms are not only promoted in composting, but also in the purification of raw sewage.

In our landfills, the process of composting occurs very slowly, if at all. This is a result not only of mixing various materials, but also of not allowing sufficient oxygen and moisture to reach the waste. By developing large-scale composting programs, resources could be created from these wastes and our landfills could be left open to materials that are not easily composted.

Each year, yard waste (grass clippings, leaves, etc.) makes up about 20 percent of the waste stream. Food scraps make up 8.5 percent and paper contributes 34 percent of all the waste created. If individuals would take the time to separate these items and communities had the proper facilities for composting them, the finished product could be used in forestry, agriculture, nurseries, home gardens and landscaping.

By the end of 1990, approximately 1,400 communities had these composting facilities, however many of them practice mixed-waste composting techniques. Mixed-waste contains plastic, glass, heavy metals and other toxic contaminants which hinder the composting process and lead to a low quality finished product. Thus they do not fully utilize the recycling process. However, this change can still be considered a step in the right direction.

Although it is not yet known what the best way to break down mixed-waste is, the simple act of composting food scraps can mean enormous savings. Even if your community does not have a composting facility, you as an individual can help in composting. It is something very basic that anyone can do to express their environmental concern.

The marketplace has picked up on people's concern for the environment and many new products to facilitate composting are now offered.

Economics behind energy conservation

By GUY McDONALD
Assistant Reporter

In recent years there has been an outcry from environmentally aware people over the United States' use and its misuse of its energy sources. Our country relies primarily on fossil fuels as our source of energy. Unfortunately, fossil fuels are (1) harmful to the environment (even when used in the most efficient facilities available) and (2) they are a nonrenewable resource which is becoming scarcer each year. In 1988, through the use of fossil fuels, the U.S. emitted an astounding 5.2 billion tons of carbon dioxide. These pollutants contribute heavily to the greenhouse effect and global warming.

If there is to be a major overhaul in our nation's energy policy, it must come in two areas. The first area is that of energy consumption. To make any energy policy effective we, as a country, must reduce our energy usage. This reduction in use does not mean that we should expect to be inconvenienced by trying to conserve energy, but instead, we should try to make sure that our homes, appliances, automobiles, etc. are as energy efficient as possible.

Some examples of ways in which we could reduce our energy consumption are flourescent bulbs instead of incandescent bulbs, using public transportation and making sure that cars are regularly tuned-up. The second area in which an energy policy should be focused on is renewable energy resources. Renewable energy resources are the unharnessed energies of nature.

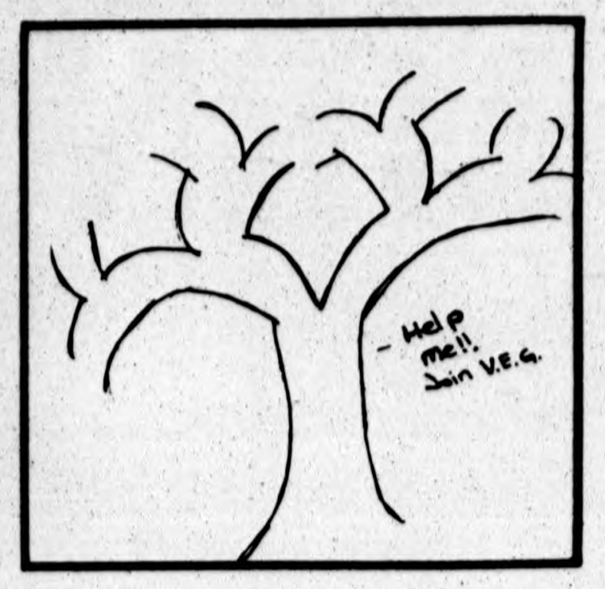
Some examples of renewable energy resources are safer to use and less damaging to the environment than fossil fuels. Also, through the use of renewable energy resources an additional advantage is that they would reduce our country's dependency on other nations for fossil fuel.

According to the newspaper Nucleus, distributed by the Union of Concerned Scientists, the main reason behind our lack of development is apathy. Up until now, any stringent energy conservation program was viewed as being unfeasible. As a result, these programs lacked consumer support on the part of the people and lack of research and development money from the government. The UCS says that this is not the case.

Through the use of a computerized energy modeling system with data provided by the UCS, The Stockholm Environment Institute and the Tellus Institute, it was determined that a solution to our energy problems is not as elusive as many people have thought. The computer used three separate scenarios to determine its results.

The first scenario is called the "Market Scenario" and it deals with current conservation trends and laws which are in effect. The second scenario is the "Environmental Scenario" which provides stricter guidelines for energy conservation and renewable energy resources. Finally, the "Climate Stabilization Scenario" embodies all of the guidelines of the Environmental Scenario but goes even further concerning carbon dioxide emissions. Such emissions would be cut 25 percent by the year 2005 and 50 percent by the year 2030. As expected, the "Market Scenario" cost the least to initiate but conversely, had the smallest impact on our environmental problems.

The most expensive scenario was the Climate Stabilization Scenario but it was also the most effective (as expected). What was not expected was the amount of money saved through the energy which was conserved by each of the scenarios. The most effective energy strategy was the "Climate Stabilization Scenario" which accumulated an amazing $2.3 trillion dollars worth of savings after the cost of implementation was deducted.



- Help me!! Join V.E.G.

By the year 2030 the effects of such a plan would be evident. Our usage of fossil fuels would be reduced by one-third of current levels and our carbon dioxide emissions would be cut from 5.8 to 1.6 billion pounds per year.

As you can see, there is no reason why, as a country, we should not adopt a stricter energy policy. The money paid out to make the initial change would be returned two-fold by the savings of the more efficient energy systems. Also, with more research dollars being spent on finding alternatives to fossil fuels, we can limit the amount of carbon dioxide we release into the atmosphere.

Although socio-economic status plays an important role in the location of commercial hazardous waste facilities, race is the leading factor.

Three out of the five largest commercial hazardous waste landfills in the United States are located in mostly black or Hispanic communities; these landfills account for 40 percent of the nation's estimated commercial landfill space.

Three out of five black and Hispanic Americans live in communities with uncontrolled toxic waste sites.

Sixty percent of the total black population (15 million) live in communities with one or more uncontrolled toxic waste sites.

Sixty percent of the total Hispanic population (8 million) live in communities with one or more uncontrolled toxis waste sites.

Cities with large black populations like St. Louis, Cleveland, Chicago, Atlanta and Memphis have the largest numbers of uncontrolled toxic waste sites.

Los Angeles has more Hispanics living in communities with uncontrolled toxic waste sites than any other metropolitan area in the United States. The higher the concentration of Hispanics in an area of the city, the higher the concentration of uncontrolled waste sites in the same area.

About half of all Asian/Pacific Islanders and Native Americans live in communities with uncontrolled waste sites.

Stomp out toxics

By JEANNINE SMOLINSKY
Assistant Reporter

Is your home or dorm room environmentally safe? Do you buy products that are harmful to the environment as well as yourself? Well, even if you do not, you should be aware that households play a crucial role in the toxic pollution crisis. Individuals and families now have the option of choosing products that can help them save money, solve household toxic problems and support industries that do not add to the toxic crisis. Reducing health risks from toxics at home is, in large part, a matter of developing new habits. The first step in "detoxing" your home or dorm is knowing what substances to which you should say "no."

When making the initial switch from a detergent to a soap laundry cleaner, wash items once with washing soda only. This will eliminate detergent residues that might otherwise react with soap and cause a yellowing of fabrics.

Finally, walk, carpool, use a bicycle or use public transportation. To reduce pollution from your car use unleaded gasoline, keep the engine well-tuned and make sure the catalytic converter is functioning properly.

LEAD

Lead is primarily a brain poison. Although it is not one of the leading causes of death today, it slowly and silently causes permanent damage to the nervous system of those exposed to it. Lead can retard the growth and development of children and decrease the capacity of adults to function normally.

City children who live in old, poorly maintained housing with peeling paint or in housing undergoing renovation, face the greatest risk of lead poisoning. Over 700,000 inner-city children are said to be suffering from lead poisoning. Fifty percent of these children are black, Latino and Asian.

Sources of lead in the environment include auto exhaust and industrial pollution, lead paint, soil if contaminated by chips of exterior paint, lead-based insecticide or highway pollution and pipes and fixtures. Source: "Race, Poverty and the Environment"

Goal: Protect the species

By MICHELE FRIESZ
Assistant Reporter

There are many reasons why it is important to save endangered species. In the preamble in the Endangered Species Act of 1973, Congress sums it up by stating that endangered species of fish, wildlife and plants "are of aesthetic, ecological, educational, historical, recreational and scientific value to the nation and its people."

All living things are a part of a complex, delicately balanced network called the biosphere. It is composed of ecosystems, the study of which includes the set of interrelationships between plants, animals and their physical environment. The removal of a single species can set off a chain reaction affecting many others. It has been estimated, for example, that a disappearing plant can take with it up to 30 other species, including insects, higher animals and even other plants.

Some other reasons why endangered species should be saved are, first of all, for medicinal purposes. Only a small fraction of the world's species have been investigated to find how their chemical composition could possibly benefit mankind. For example, penicillin was derived from a fungus and certain plants have yielded substances used in drugs to treat heart disease, cancer and a variety of other serious illnesses.

Also, there are agricultural benefits to saving endangered species. Many seemingly insignificant forms of life have begun to show important benefits as "biological controls" in agriculture. For example, some farmers are beginning to use insects and other animals that compete with or prey on certain crop pests, as well as using plants containing natural toxin compounds that repel harmful insects. In many cases these are a safe, effective and less expensive alternative to synthetic chemicals.

Only a small fraction of the world's species have been investigated to find how their chemical composition could possibly benefit mankind.

In addition, many individual species are uniquely important as indicators of environmental quality. For example, the rapid decline in bald eagles and peregrine falcons was a dramatic warning of the dangers of DDT, a strong, widely used pesticide that accumulates in body tissues. Also, certain plants, such as the Eastern White Pine, are particularly good indicators of excess ozone, sulfur dioxide and other air pollutants.

A final reason for preserving endangered species is moral consideration. Many people believe that every creature, after adapting for thousands or even millions of years to fit a constantly changing environment, has an intrinsic right to exist. Exterminating other forms of life, they say, would not only be short-sighted, but wrong — especially since the species are irreplaceable. Humankind would also be the loser. The quality of human life would be diminished.

Endangered means there is still time, but extinction is forever.

show control because you never know what might happen."

V: It is midseason right now. Let us say it is mid-term time. If you were to grade both yourself and the team, what grades would you give?

CW: "Myself, a C. The team, a C also. We're average right now. I think we will be better and we have to be because we're entering a stretch of crucial games. We have three straight road games; hopefully we can take two of three and all three would be great. It's time to make our move."

V: You have always been a vocal force on the court, like a floor general. What does that role entail and do you enjoy it?

CW: "I enjoy being a floor general. I'm a vocal, enthusiastic person. It's part of my makeup to be in control of things, not to tell people what to do though. When I'm in control, we execute well . . . Not so much scoring for me, but I'm a defensive spark and I like to get the crowd into the game. Whether it's looking for Greg Woodard or breaking the press, I take care of the little things. Those are the kind of things I do for the team."

V: As it stands right now, the team is 8-9, 5-4 in the Big East. Where is this Villanova team headed?

CW: "We had a tough loss at Providence, that killed us. And then another tough one at UConn. But we got the win over Temple which was really big. That could act as the turning point, as it did my sophomore year. The schedule is definitely in our favor in the end and we know we must win our home games, those are big."

Chris Walker is going to be an entertainer, a singer. I don't know if it's set yet, but I'm expecting to do a concert at Villanova with Rob Base.

Chris Walker

V: Are there any teams in the Big East that you think might finish particularly strong?

CW: "Syracuse and Connecticut are the two teams I see really going down to the wire, with us right there also."

V: You have been at Villanova now for almost four years. What are the things, good or bad, that you will remember most, either as an athlete or a student?

CW: "Curfews, dorm curfews (he chuckles) . . . But not too much bad. It was a great educational experience and the people are very kind. I liked my four years here and I don't think I could have gone anywhere else and had a better experience."

V: What does life after Villanova hold for Chris Walker? Could a position in coaching be a possibility?

CW: "Chris Walker is going to be an entertainer, a singer. I don't know if it's set yet, but I'm expecting to do a concert at Villanova with Rob Base, open up for him that is, in April. Right now, I'm trying to get my singing career under way for when I finish my career at Villanova. But I would like to coach someday, I really would."

V: Is there anything else you would like to add at this time?

CW: "Just tell the fans to stay behind us because we're going to get it done, as we always do every year. This year is no different. Our crowd is into the games and that's what really keeps us up."

first half as S.U. commanded its largest lead with nearly eight minutes remaining, 20-14. The Cats battled back and took the lead with three minutes to go on a Benedix field goal, 26-24. 'Nova would take a 31-26 halftime lead which it would not relinquish into the locker room.

"We took good quality shots," said Perretta. "We ran our motion offense and the difference in this game was that we shot well and Syracuse did not."

Thornton paced the Cats with 21 points and six assists. Benedix (17), Sheri Walker (12) and Magarity (11) also reached double figures for 'Nova.

"We have tough teams to play," said Perretta. "But we feel we're playing better. We're in a groove now."

The Cats travel to the University of Pittsburgh tomorrow for a 1 p.m. matchup against the Panthers.

Swimmers sweep Delaware

By BOB TRAVISANO
Staff Reporter

The swim teams continued its roll and pulled off another undefeated week with dual wins over University of Delaware.

The men's record stands at 8-7-1, while the nationally ranked women cruised to 9-1, maintaining its No. 21 ranking in the poll.

The men had several standout performances against Delaware, Feb.1-2. In the 100-yard backstroke, the tandem of Sean Kelliker and Dan Thomas came in first and third. Rob Drumm placed first in the 200-yard freestyle and destroyed his competition in the 500-yard freestyle. His closest competitor was 11 seconds behind at the finish.

For the women, Lisa Flood placed first in the 100-yard butterfly and the 500-yard freestyle. To add to her standout season, Flood gained a chance to qualify for the Canadian Olympic Team. Sarah Dykstra came in first in the 100-yard breastroke, Christy Bridgewater finished first in the 200-yard freestyle, Mary Dowling placed second in the 200-yard freestyle and Eileen Consadine won the 100-yard freestyle.

The Cats face a tough challenge this weekend at home against Miami. The Hurricanes have the best divers in the country but lack overall depth.

The team looks forward to the Big East tournament and archrival Pittsburgh. Consadine said "We want to kill Pitt."

The team feels that if it comes down to a one-swimmer race the one to carry the women will be Flood.

However, Mary Dowling says, "Everyone has to do something, you can't leave it up to one person. We need everyone to win the Big East Championship."

Zajac qualifies

By MIKE AGOLINO
Staff Reporter

The women's track team traveled to the Boston area for the second consecutive week, competing Feb. 1 at the Terrier Classic held at Boston University. The Cats won one event and qualified three individuals for the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships to be held in March.

Sophomore Carole Zajac, who qualified automatically for an event in the NCAA Championships for the second straight week, led the Cats. Zajac, who automatically qualified in the 3000-meter event last week at the New England Invitational, met the automatic standard time this week in the 5000-meter event. Her time of 16:10.28 made her the top collegiate finisher in the race. She finished second only to former Villanova standout Sonia O'Sullivan, who won in a time of 15:35.60.

In the 3000-meter race, two other Villanova runners met the NCAA standard for automatic qualification to the national championships. Both Kate Fonshell and Cheri Goddard qualified easily with times of 9:15.40 and 9:21.40, respectively.

Villanova junior Irene Ruopoli had little trouble winning the 1000 meter competition, capturing first place. Her winning time of 2:49.90 helped her overcome her nearest competitor by more than seven seconds.

Due to the strong performances turned in by the team over the past few weeks, the Jan. 29 edition of the NCAA News projected the Cats to finish third in the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships. The projection is based on the projected points reported by the Division I-A Men's and Women's Track and Field Coaches Association. Florida is ranked first with a score of 53 points, LSU second with 47, and 'Nova third with 38. This honor comes as no great surprise since Villanova finished in the top five at the championships for the past five years and has continued to perform well this year.

Head Coach Marty Stern thought that his athletes ran well even though the season is still relatively young.

"Kate, Carole, and Cheri ran excellent early-season times, and in my opinion should score very well in the NCAA's. With these early-season automatic qualifiers, our team is beginning to come together and it looks like another good year," said Stern.

In their next meet, the Cats will travel to Madison Square Garden in New York City to compete in the Millrose Games. Villanova will run in the 4x800 meter relay.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

MICHELLE THORNTON

This week's Villanovan Athlete of the Week is Michelle Thornton. The freshman point guard led the Cats to a pair of victories last week. Thornton scored 16 points in a 79-61 win over Big 5 rival Pennsylvania. She then scored 21 points and distributed six assists in a 74-63 victory over Syracuse.

Mahon takes first

By LARRY LANZA
Senior Reporter

A year from the weekend in which he set an outstanding personal best time in the very same meet and event, junior Terrence Mahon made another breakthrough in the 5000-meter run at the Terrier classic in Boston Feb.1

Running on the 200-meter banked track of Boston University, Mahon finished as the first collegian and fifth runner overall in the Invitational 5000 meters, covering the 3.1 mile distance in 13:48. Mahon's time, which automatically qualifies him for the NCAA Championship, took six seconds off the personal best performance he achieved at the meet in 1991.

Winner Mark Coogan, a national class runner from Nike Boston, finished about 100 meters ahead of Mahon in 13:34. Among those finishing behind Mahon were recent world class standout Doug Padilla of Nike West and Villanova freshman Dave Hartman, who had a breakthrough performance of his own, finishing 11th in 14:21.

"Terrence is one of the hottest distance runners in America right now, and I'm sure he'll perform well at the NCAA's," stated Head Coach Marty Stern. "It's great to get the standard out of the way and allow him to just train."

What the NCAA qualification means to Mahon's training is that he can now work on building his strength for the championship season ahead without having to concern himself with keeping his legs fresh for weekend racing.

The racing focus over the next couple of weeks now shifts to 'Nova's 4x800m relay, which, despite a fall on the third leg, still managed to run an NCAA provisional qualifying time of 7:29 at the Terrier Classic.

After getting off to an excellent start on the strength of a 1:51 half-mile leadoff leg by freshman Louie Quintana and a follow-up 1:53 second leg by sophomore Mike Going, the Wildcats ran into trouble on leg No. 3.

On the track for the Cats was senior Finn Kelly, and when he tried to pass to the inside of the runner ahead, he was forced off the track and onto the floor. Kelly picked up the baton and returned to the track, still managing a 1:53 split.

Junior Brad Sumner then anchored Villanova with a 1:51 to bring the Cats to a fourth place finish. Finishing as the winner in 7:24 was Dartmouth.

"It was unfortunate that Finn Kelly was sprawled all over the boards when he should have been running, but sometimes in athletics you face disappointments," said Stern. "He and the other athletes ran very well, and I'm especially proud of Quintana's leadoff leg."

'Nova's next chance for an automatic NCAA qualification comes tonight at the fabled Millrose Games in New York City's Madison Square Garden. Site of numerous Villanova wins of past history, the meet will provide an exciting atmosphere off which the Cats will be able to key in their effort for a fast time.

One man who came through with a fast clocking for 'Nova in Boston was senior Tom Pollis. Running in the mile. Pollis improved his IC4Aqualifyingtime in the event with a personal best of 4:09, good for third. Steve Holman of Georgetown ran 4:02 to finish first.

Qualifying for the IC4As in the event for the first time was freshman Kyle Watson, who ran 4:13 to finish eighth. Freshman Ken Nason also competed in the event, running 4:14.

Another Wildcat turning in a strong performance was senior Greg Mirecki. Competing off the track in the 35 pound weight throw, Mirecki achieved a top effort of 49 feet to finish fourth. Northeastern's Paul Kortick took the win with a throw of 60 feet.

> Terrence is one of the hottest distance runners in America right now, and I'm sure he'll perform well at the NCAA's.

Back on the track, 'Nova entered eight men in a very competitive 800 meter event, where Ken Nason ran an IC4A-qualifying time of 1:52 to place 12th, the highest finish for V.U. Also qualifying for the IC4A's in the race was freshman Kyle Watson, who ran 1:53.

Running in different heats for the Wildcats were Tim Pollis (1:55), freshman Chuck Silvester (1:56), sophomore Mike Shemonsky (1:57), senior Joe Sigey (1:58), sophomore Lou Kahl (1:59) and freshman Andreas Von Scheele (1:59). Former Providence standout John Evans of the Boston Running Club ran 1:48 to earn first.

Looking back on the past weekend, Stern said, "Our team is beginning to look good for the NCAA's with (Salaam) Gariba and (Terrence) Mahon qualified, and if we can get our 4x800 team qualified, our team has the chance to get into the national picture. I feel like our 4x800 may be one of the best in the country.

"The freshmen also performed well; with people like Hartman, Nason, Watson, Silvester, and Quintana all running personal bests, the future is so bright for us."

In addition to its 4x800 meter relay, Villanova will also run junior sprinter Salaam Gariba tonight at the Millrose Games. Gariba will be competing in the 60 meter dash, an event for which he has already automatically qualified for the NCAAs.

Men's Week in Review

By JUSTIN KESTNER

SYRACUSE

The Orangemen took control of first place in the Big East after going 2-1 for the week. The Orange first lost to Providence 87-73, even though Dave Johnson scored 21 points and grabbed 10 rebounds and freshman Glenn Sekunda added 18 points. Syracuse proceeded to knock off Seton Hall after trailing by as many as 13, as freshman star Lawrence Moten scored 19 points. Syracuse then beat Connecticut 84-83 behind Dave Johnson's 26 points. The win marked Syracuse's 20th straight in the Carrier Dome. Syracuse, currently ranked 13th, leads the conference in three-pointers per game (6.68).

CONNECTICUT

The Connecticut Huskies suffered an 0-2 week and fell into second place. UConn got blown out by St. John's 90-57 at Madison Square Garden Feb. 7. The Huskies could not pull it together against a hungrier St. John's squad. The Huskies attempted to rebound against Syracuse, but were turned back 84-83. Chris Smith led UConn with 25 points, scoring 17 of them in the last 13 minutes. Connecticut, now ranked 10th, will host Seton Hall tomorrow.

PITTSBURGH

Pitt went 2-0 for the week, crushing Miami 82-52 and defeating Providence 85-81. The Panthers have been playing with much intensity in their last several games. Senior leader Sean Miller currently leads the Big East in assists (6.4), is second in free throw percentage (.847) and is eighth in three-pointers (1.62). Pitt will square off against Boston College tomorrow.

GEORGETOWN

The Hoyas went 1-1 for the week, not including their win against 'Nova. They first downed St. John's 61-48 behind Alonzo Mourning's 20 points and Irvin Church's 16. Mourning also had 11 rebounds and two blocks. Georgetown then suffered a heartbreaking 88-86 loss to Boston College in double overtime. In the game, Mourning scored a career-high 38 points, hauled in 16 boards and rejected six shots. Georgetown will host Providence tomorrow.

ST. JOHN'S

St. John's went 1-1 for the week. Malik Sealy, the conference's second leading scorer, had 12 points for the Redmen in its 61-48 loss at Georgetown. In its 90-57 dismantling of Connecticut, St. John's played well in all phases of the game, particularly rebounding. Defense is another key for the Redmen, as they are first in the Big East in steals and second in scoring defense. St. John's will host Villanova tomorrow.

BOSTON COLLEGE

B.C. won its only Big East game last week, pulling out an 88-86 double-overtime win at Georgetown. Malcolm Huckaby, who scored a career-high 34 points, led the Eagles.

He scored seven in the final 54 seconds of regulation. B.C. trailed by eight late in the game, but managed to send it to overtime and record its fourth conference victory. The Eagles will host Pitt tomorrow.

SETON HALL

The Pirates could not hold on to a 13-point lead and lost at Syracuse, despite receiving solid efforts from Terry Dehere and Luther Wright. Turnovers and poor rebounding down the stretch proved to be fatal for Seton Hall, which has the second-worst turnover ratio in the conference (1-8). The Hall will travel to Connecticut for another tough contest tomorrow.

PROVIDENCE

The Friars began the week by defeating Syracuse 87-73 behind Michael Smith's 23 points and 12 rebounds and Marques Bragg's 12 points. Providence iced the game with a 15-3 run in the last 2:24. The Friars then lost a tough one to Pitt, 85-81. Smith contributed 16 points and 13 boards in a losing effort. P.C. will play at Georgetown tomorrow.

MIAMI

Miami went 0-1 last week, dropping to 1-8 in conference play. The Hurricanes were crushed by Pitt, 82-52. The Canes are near the bottom of several statistic categories, including scoring and field goal percentage. They have lost five straight conference games.

BIG EAST PLAYERS OF THE WEEK

Malcolm Huckaby of Boston College and Alonzo Mourning of Georgetown were named co-Players of the Week. Huckaby, a 6-foot-3 sophomore guard, set a career-high in points with 34 as the Eagles beat G'town in double-overtime 88-86. Mourning averaged 29 points, 13.5 rebounds and four blocks as the Hoyas went 1-1 on the week.

Michael Smith of Providence was selected as the Big East Rookie of the Week for the second consecutive week. The 6-foot-8 sophomore had a pair of double-doubles, averaging 19.5 points and 11.5 rebounds.

Women's Week in Review

By ALEX SCOFIELD
Staff Reporter

MIAMI

The Hurricanes made Big East history this week when they became the first-ever conference team to enter the national Top 10. After storming past Boston College 79-60, Miami has an unblemished league record of 10-0, 18-1 overall. The pollsters took notice. ranking the Canes as the ninth-place team in the country. Frances Savage (22.3 p.p.g) and Jeannie Hebert (7.5 assists/game) have been instrumental in establishing the Hurricanes as the conference's most feared squad.

GEORGETOWN

After keeping pace with Miami throughout the season, the Hoyas fell a step behind the Hurricanes after a 72-67 lost to Connecticut on the road. The loss to the Huskies dropped Georgetown's second-place record to 8-2. If G'town is to attain the top spot in the conference, it needs strong performances in its upcoming matches against powerhouses Miami and Providence.

PROVIDENCE

Neither Seton Hall nor Pittsburgh was able to stop the Big East's highest-scoring team. The Lady Friars, who average an astounding 87.6 points per game, won easy contests against their two second-division opponents. Tracy Lis was unstoppable in a pair of contests that earned her the Player of the Week title. In a 97-63 thrashing of the Hall, she put up 34 points for P.C. and scored another 34 against Pitt in a 91-83 victory.

CONNECTICUT

For the second consecutive week, UConn remains in a third-place deadlock with Providence. The Huskies matched P.C.'s 2-0 pace with their own pair of victories over Boston College and Georgetown, and their league record rose to 7-3. The Huskies are a difficult team to play on their own turf. The team has a 5-1 Big East record at home and the Gampel Pavilion has been drawing large crowds for their games throughout the season.

ST. JOHN'S

Occupying a very distant fifth-place spot in the conference, the Express dropped to 4-6 against league competition when they lost to Seton Hall by a score of 61-57. Turnovers continue to be a problem for St. John's, whose -3.1 ratio is the second worst in the Big East.

SETON HALL

The Hall is one of four Big East teams with a 3-7 conference record. After losing to Providence, the Lady Pirates bounced back to defeat St. John's at home. Although Seton Hall has no dominant shooters, it can depend on tough defense from the likes of Dawn Johnson and Kelley Moore.

PITTSBURGH

A four-game losing streak has dropped Pitt one game away from the Big East cellar. The Lady Panthers lost a pair last week against Georgetown and Providence. Sure-shot Jonna Huenrich leads the league in field goal percentage at .531, but was unable to lead Pitt past its competition.

SYRACUSE

Rounding out the four-way tie for sixth place, the Orangewomen proved to be even colder than Pittsburgh. S.U.'s 74-63 home loss against Villanova marked the fifth consecutive defeat for the team. A road trip to Pittsburgh and Seton Hall provides Syracuse with an opportunity to put an end to the streak before its difficult schedule at the end of the season.

BOSTON COLLEGE

After playing away from home for three straight games, the Eagles lost their fifth straight game and assumed sole possession of last place in the Big East. B.C. was the latest in Miami's lengthy string of victims last week and fell to 2-8 for the season.

The Wildcats begin a three-game Big East road trip with conference games at St. John's and Pittsburgh. Villanova is currently 8-10, 5-4 in the Big East. The Cats must shoot for the top of the conference in hopes of receiving an at-large NCAA bid, and needs to at least split these two tough conference road games if it hopes to entertain NCAA thoughts.

Villanova travels to New York to play the 11-7 St. John's Redmen in their home confines, Alumni Hall tomorrow night. St. John's broke out of a three-game conference losing streak Feb. 1 by demolishing the No. 6 Connecticut Huskies by 33 points, 90-57. Their starting center Robert Werdann has been sidelined since the Villanova-St. John's game at duPont Pavilion Jan. 2. The Redmen have not been able to bear the brunt of his loss as Head Coach Lou Carnesecca's club has gone 4-6 in his absence. This skid is extremely disappointing considering the fact that the Redmen entered the year in some people's Final Four predictions.

Malik Sealy leads the Redmen, averaging over 23 points per game. Senior Jason Buchanan heads the point with confidence and experience. For the Cats to pull off a very impressive victory at St. John's, they must take care of the basketball, take good shots, and get to the free-throw line, where they average 80 percent.

The Cats travel to Pitt and its intimidating home gym, Fitzgerald Field House, Feb. 10. Pitt, currently 5-0 at home, has beaten Villanova eight straight times at the Field House. Head Coach Paul Evans' Panthers currently stand at 13-8, the surprise of the Big East. Pitt shocked the country in late November with an 85-67 drubbing of the Kentucky Wildcats in Lexington, KY. Pitt is a young team with the tendency to go on streaks, opening the conference 3-0, then dropping four straight. Pitt has rebounded well by winning two in a row. The Panthers are led by seniors Sean Miller and Darren Morningstar, while many first and second-year players play significant roles. Freshmen Orlando Antigua and Jerry McCullough have impressed many by showing poise in the clutch and power forward Chris McNeal has played well in the blocks for Evans in his second year. Evans feels this team is a much better defensive team than last year's enigmatic bunch of seniors that disappointed many. Villanova must show poise on offense and get back on the defensive end. This Panther club likes to run when the opportunity presents itself. Villanova is currently 3-8 when the opposition scores 70 or more points, and that should be the barometer of success against Pitt.

Cats roughed up by Hoyas, Mourning

Marc Dowdell had 12 points for the Cats in a 71-63 loss to Georgetown. 'Nova falls to 8-10, 5-4 in the Big East.

After Villanova's 71-63 loss to Georgetown at the Spectrum Feb. 4, there is only one sure thing about the 'Nova basketball team.

Expect the unexpected.

Having already beaten the Hoyas Jan. 4 on the road and coming off a Big Five win over rival Temple, the chances of a 'Nova victory looked promising. Couple that with the fact that the Cats had an opportunity to even their record at 9-9 before embarking on a three-game Big East road trip, and this looked like a must-win. But remember, this is 'Nova, where things rarely go according to plan.

On the strengths of Alonzo Mourning's 26 points, 33 of 38 free-throw shooting and a tenacious, aggressive defense, the Hoyas snatched an eight-point road win and dropped the Cats to 5-4 in the Big East.

"Georgetown was much more aggressive," said Head Coach Rollie Massimino. "They really went after us and they knocked out their foul shots."

G'town hit 13 of 14 in the final 2:19 to secure the victory after 'Nova had pulled to within three at 58-55 on two Marc Dowdell free throws. On the other hand, 'Nova struggled all game from the stripe. The conference's leading free-throw shooting team shot just 62.5 percent on the night, 20 of 32.

"Foul shooting plus rebound margin made the difference," said Massimino.

"Credit Georgetown," said guard Lance Miller, who led the Cats with 22 points. "They played a lot harder than we did and we shot very poorly [from the foul line]. I shot really bad."

The game was decided, though, by more than just free-throw shooting. The Hoyas, who started two freshmen and two sophomores to complement the senior Mourning, were the ones who jumped out to the early lead, not the experienced Wildcats. The Hoyas hit five straight shots, including three three-pointers to take a 20-4 lead.

> Georgetown was much more aggressive. They really went after us and they knocked out their foul shots.
> Head Coach Rollie Massimino

Fortunately, the Cats woke up and pulled to within two at 23-21 by holding Georgetown scoreless for over nine minutes. But a Mourning layup at the buzzer propelled G'town to a 25-21 halftime lead.

Mourning, the all-America candidate, was literally unstoppable in the second half. The young Hoya guards started patiently getting the ball into Mourning, who was scoring at will inside. He scored 21 of his 26 in the second half to enable G'town to hold the lead. Every time it looked liked the Cats were going to make a run, Mourning put in another bucket. It did not help to foul him either since he shot 14 of 15 from the line.

"We were much more patient in the second half," said Georgetwon Head Coach John Thompson. "We concentrated more on Alonzo and also on limiting Villanova's three's."

Unlike Temple, who played a zone defense, the Hoyas played a very aggressive man-to-man defense. This was done primarily to stop 'Nova's major offensive weapon, Greg Woodard. Woodard hit six three-pointers in the win over Temple but was held to just one Tuesday night.

NOTES: The loss leaves the Cats at 8-10, 5-4 in the Big East. After a three-game road trip, 'Nova finishes the year with four of six at home, including two against last place Miami ... In addition to Miller's 22 points, forward Marc Dowdell had 12 points and five rebounds. Off the bench, Arron Bain and Calvin Byrd each clipped in with eight points ... Georgetown's last field goal was a three-pointer by Joey Brown. It came with 11:38 remaining ... Tune in to WXVU 89.1 FM for tomorrow night's game against St. John's plus a halftime special on the incoming recruiting classes for basketball and football.

One-on-One with Chris Walker

By ANDY FITZPATRICK

For three straight years now, the sight of No. 15 bringing up the ball, firing up his fellow teammates, and running the offense for the Cats has become a familiar sight for 'Nova fans. It is no coincidence that the same guy also led the team into the NCAA's his last two years as a starter.

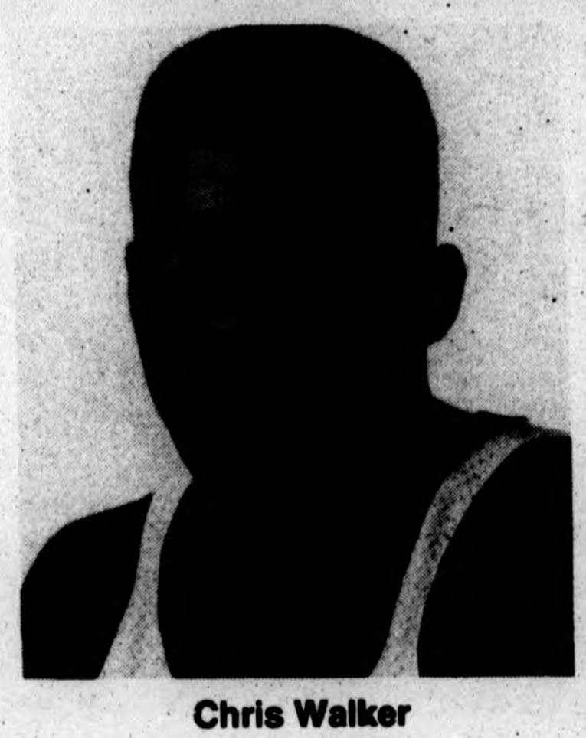
This player is 5-foot-11 senior point guard Chris Walker. The floor leader is the only Cat to have started all 18 games this year. In fact, in his illustrious career, Walker has started 79 of the last 83 games, a span that began in his sophomore season. And as his college career winds down, the Villanovan had the opportunity to sit down and talk with Walker about himself, the team, and his future.

VILLANOVAN: Let us start in the preseason. It is your senior year, third as a starter. The team returns all five starters. What kind of expectations did the team have going into the year?

WALKER: "We thought we were going to be a Top 20 team, preseason ranking that is, but it didn't happen. We were disappointed about that because we had an experienced team but then we had the rough start. That kind of messed up things a bit."

V: What about yourself? Did you set any personal goals?

CW: "Just to run the team, be a leader and get us in the tournament, hopefully the Final Four. As far as individually, make the all-conference team, or at least one of the teams."



Chris Walker

V: Let us flashback to the Houston game. It was a homecoming for you, but things did not go well. The team lost by 30 and you were held scoreless. Can you attribute this to anything?

CW: "It was just a bad game for us. They played exceptionally well; we didn't expect them to play as well as they did. And we weren't ready to play so those are the things I attribute the loss to, plus it was the first game of the year and it was away. As in the Houston game and the other early games, we didn't play hard. That's what happens when you play good teams on the road, you get killed."

V: The team starts 0-3, then 2-6. Keep in mind this is before Big East play. Was there ever a time when you thought "Hey, maybe we're just not that good, or maybe the coaching is at fault. Or a combination of both." What were you thinking at this point?

CW: "It was never the coaching because obviously he [Head Coach Rollie Massimino] is a great coach. That's an understatement. We kind of got down on ourselves, and were thinking about what might go wrong next. Everybody was down on us, you know how the fans are. We stuck together, won a few games and everything turned around for us somewhere."

V: From 2-6 to 6-6. How come? What happened?

CW: "We just got on one of those rolls ... We started executing better on offense, our defense finally started to pick up the intensity and before you knew it, it was making a difference for us.

"Those four wins were not against pushovers, they were quality Big East wins. The way I look at it is, I would rather be 2-6 going into Big East play and then 4-1 in the conference, rather than heading into conference play 6-2 and starting 1-4 in the Big East. It's all evened out."

V: The Seton Hall game. This was one of the greatest comebacks [down 12 with four minutes left] in Villanova's recent memory. After the horn sounds, you throw the ball into the stands on an emotional high. Next thing you know, a fan is taking you to court for hitting him in the face. What happened?

CW: "It's my claim to fame (he chuckles) ... It was an unfortunate accident and it was definitely unintentional. It was out of jubilation. I thought nothing of it and the next thing I know, I'm getting reprimanded ... it's taught me a lesson. Sometimes you have to

Women win two

After dropping seven consecutive games, the women's basketball team reversed the trend, winning its past two contests. The Cats defeated Big Five rival Penn before winning on the road against Syracuse. 'Nova's record now stands at 7-12 overall and 3-8 in the Big East.

Coming off a blowout loss to Miami, the Cats rebounded to defeat the Quakers 79-61 at the Palestra Jan. 29. 'Nova seized an early first half lead and put away Penn by connecting on 80 percent of its free throws (18-22). The Cats secured this Big Five win by using deft outside shooting. 'Nova shot 43 percent from the floor and hit eight of 13 attempts from beyond the three-point stripe.

The Cats dominated play in the opening half with Nikki Benedix paving the way with 13 points. At halftime, 'Nova owned a ten point lead, 42-32.

"This game gave us a lot of confidence," said Head Coach Harry Perretta. "We had the open' shots and, when you're playing with confidence, you tend to make those (shots)."

To start the second half, the Cats outscored Penn 18-7 in the first nine minutes to build an insurmountable lead. The Quakers whittled the lead down to 14 points on several occasions but would get no closer.

"This was an emotional game which we were able to win," said Perretta. "We got the lead and kept it."

Benedix led the Cats with 20 points and Michele Thornton added 16. Rosemary Magarity and Jennifer Maga contributed 12 and 10 points, respectively.

In their road contest at the Carrier Dome Feb. 1, the Cats toppled Syracuse, 74-63. Like the Penn game, 'Nova shot a solid 43 percent from the field while connecting on 26 of 30 free throw attempts.

"It's very important and very difficult to win (on the road in the Big East)," said Perretta. "If you want to be an upper division team, you have to win these games."

Siblings visit 'Nova during weekend

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

The eighth annual Sibling Weekend sponsored by the Student Programming Council (SPC), Resident Student Association (RSA) and Association of Commuting Students (ACS) took place Feb. 7-9.

"The 1991-1992 Sibling Weekend committee organized the weekend's activities for the 560 University students and siblings who participated in the event," said Co-chairperson of Sibling Weekend Deirdre Healey.

Siblings were registered in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center between 5:30-8:30 p.m. Friday. The RSA sponsored a carnival in the Belle Air Terrace from 6-9 p.m.

"At the carnival, Villanova siblings played various games and had their faces painted with Wildcat paw prints," said Healey.

"Our goal was to satisfy all of the siblings and to plan activities which would appeal to all age groups," said Co-Chairperson Jenn DiObilda.

"The Rocketeer" was aired twice Feb. 7 in the Connelly Center Cinema. "Special bracelets served as admission tickets [for the movies and] to all of the weekend's events," said Healey.

University students and their siblings ate breakfast and lunch on Saturday and brunch on Sunday in the resident cafeterias. Students and siblings were asked to adhere to specific seating times to avoid overcrowding in the cafeterias. Food tickets were distributed to Villanova siblings at registration for each meal.

"Alumni gym was an 'open gym' for University students with their siblings," said Healey. Soccer balls and basketballs were available for Villanova students and siblings from 8:30 a.m.-12 p.m., Healey added.

Bus trips to the Franklin Institute, Academy of Natural Sciences and Viking Ice Center were scheduled for Saturday afternoon.

"Generally, things went pretty smoothly with the trips," said Sibling Weekend faculty advisor Randy Farmer. "Both the parents and siblings seemed happy," he added.

One of the buses going to the Viking Ice Center had problems reaching its destination, resulting in a half-hour delay for the skaters, said assistant chairperson Christine Horner. The students and siblings were given the option to remain at the ice skating rink or to receive a full money-back refund for the cost of the skating trip, added Horner.

"Despite these problems, everyone seemed to enjoy themselves," Healey said.

"101 Dalmatians" was aired on Saturday afternoon in the Connelly Center Cinema. "Attendance at the movies was fairly high," said Horner.

A buffet dinner was served in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center on Saturday evening. A juggler, clown and magician were present for the siblings' entertainment. said Horner.

Changes in Arts curriculum to affect Class of 1996

By LARISA EPATKO
News Editor

A new College of Arts and Sciences core curriculum will emphasize writing with requirements in fine arts, college ethics and diversity, said Dr. John Doody, director of the core program. Changes in the curriculum will affect next year's incoming freshman class.

The most important aspect of the new core is "having the college reaffirm its commitment to undergraduate education," Doody said.

The curriculum wil require students to take four writing intensive and four writing enriched courses to improve communication and writing skills, according to a report by the Rev. Kail Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

The old core included three semesters each of philosophy, religion and English. New requirements decreased this number to two semesters for each area, said Doody.

"Every student, in addition to taking two religion courses, must take humanities seminars 1 and 2 and an ethics course," said Dr. Gaile Pohlhaus of Religious Studies.

Religious Studies faculty members will teach some of the humanities and ethics classes, "so not all students will lose the three religion courses," Pohlhaus said.

Four years ago University deans decided to make the curriculum changes, said Doody in an interview for the January 1992 issue of the Chautauqua. "Some of the educational ideas that may have driven the core in the 1960s may have changed in the meantime," he added.

The new core will require students to take integrative courses, where students can examine topics from different perspectives,

Alcohol Awareness weekend previewed

By JENNIFER CASTELLI
News Editor

The No. 1 cause of drug problems in the United States, alcohol, will be the focus of a three-day weekend of awareness, Feb. 21-23. This weekend's campaign, entitled "Be Free for the Weekend," will promote recreational alternatives to using alcohol.

"We've had a lot of campus involvement and support for the project because this is something that everyone needs to be aware of," said Lynn Hincken, prevention specialist from the Center for Alcohol and Drug Assistance, the sponsor of the event.

Students who pledge to stay sober will receive a button that says "I'm free for the Weekend." This button will enable students to take advantage of reduced price and/or free admission from a variety of businesses who are participating in the prevention effort.

Dr. James C. Berman, a Villanova alumnus and a certified specialist in addiction medicine at Bryn Mawr Hospital, will present a talk on "Addiction: Shattering the Myths," Feb. 20 at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center, according to a University Press Release. He will also speak about "Addiction: Research, History and New Frontiers," at a faculty colloquium earlier in the day. Berman's lectures will be cosponsored by Villanova's Social Science Forum.

Students Against Driving Drunk (SADD) will host a mocktail party in Connelly Center Feb. 20 from 11 a.m.-2 p.m.

In a DUI (Driving Under the Influence) program Feb. 21 at 1:15 p.m., Radnor Township Police will demonstrate equipment used at accident scenes; location to be announced, according to a University Press Release. The Resident Student Asociation (RSA) will sponsor a volleyball competition in the Jake Nevin Field House from 4-6 p.m.

> We've had a lot of campus involvement and support for the project because this is something that everyone needs to be aware of.
> Lynn Hincken, prevention specialist from the Center for Alcohol and Drug Assistance

A panel discussion will be held Feb. 21 from 2-5 p.m. to discuss campus-wide attitudes regarding alcohol and drug use. Students are encouraged to attend and voice their opinions in order to promote drinking awareness, said Hincken.

Career Days stress social responsibility in work place

By KRISTIN BRIGGS
Staff Reporter

The second annual Socially Responsible Career Days were held Feb. 11-13. Career Planning and Placement, the Center for Peace and Justice and the Law School's Public Interest Law Society sponsored the event.

The days consisted of a three-stage event designed to illustrate to students that once they have graduated from college they can still be socially responsible in the work place.

The three steps in the process included a speech, a career fair and a panel discussion.

Kerry Kennedy Cuomo gave a speech Feb. 11 entitled "Human Rights and Personal Commitment." Cuomo is the daughter of the late Robert F. Kennedy and the daughter-in-law of Gov. Mario Cuomo of New York. She is the director of the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Center for Human Rights.

Cuomo discussed careers for a brighter future and socially responsible career opportunities.

A Career Fair was held Feb. 13 at 12 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center. Students were able to gather information about the causes different organizations and corporations support. Representatives were also available to explain typical positions, internships or volunteer work that may exist within their corporations.

"It is important to understand this was not a job fair. It was more of an informal information session," said Brenda Schuck from Career Planning and Placement.

Some organizations who were at the career fair were Actionaids, Teacher Service Corps, Committee of 70 and Disabilities Law Project.

The final event was a panel discussion, which took place Feb. 13 in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall. The panel consisted of four professionals who had successfully incorporated their social issues into their professional lives.

The first guest was Rich Henneberg from Booz Allen consulting firm.

Henneberg works with the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). He is also a 1990 alumnus of the University.

The second panel member was Joy Riebow, the director of Human Resources with the Urban League of Philadelphia.

The third panel member was Jeaneen Riely, coordinator of Residence Life. She graduated from Villanova in 1986.

The fourth and final panel member was David Kreel, a third-year law student at the University. He has been involved with Public Interest Law Work and is a volunteer in Lawyers for the Arts.

The panel discussion informally discussed their experiences.

MILWAUKEE

Jeffrey Dahmer is on trial in Milwaukee, Wis., for killing and dismembering 17 males.

His attorney, Gerald Boyle, claims Dahmer is insane due to necrophilia, the practice of engaging in sexual intercourse with a corpse.

According to Wisconsin's insanity laws, it must be proved that he suffers from a mental disease that made him either unable to conform to the law or know right from wrong.

The defense psychiatrists agree that Dahmer knew what he was doing was wrong but could not control his compulsions to have sex with corpses.

If Boyle cannot prove his suspicions and Dahmer is proven sane, he will be sentenced to life imprisonment. If found insane, Dahmer will be sent to a mental institution.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The Justice Department recently announced that it will hire 300 border patrol officers and 200 immigration agents in an effort to strengthen border security and decrease crime by illegal immigrants.

The borders of Texas and California will be heavily reinforced to prevent drug smuggling and unlawful entry into the country.

The main tasks of the immigration agents will be to locate and deport immigrants and to assist local police in drug plagued cities. One-fourth of these investigators will seek employers who hire aliens in violation of the 1986 immigration law.

The creation of a National Criminal Alien Tracking Center is planned to keep watch on immigrants arrested or crimes within the country.

Russian Vice President Alexander V. Rutskoi attacked President Boris Yeltsin's free-market economic policies Feb. 8 Rutskoi feels that Russia's economy is suffering greatly and that Yeltsin should declare an economic state of emergency.

Since December Rutskoi has been Yeltsin's biggest critic.

One of his main objections against Yeltsin is for introducing reforms, piecemeal, and for allowing prices on consumer goods to rise by an average of 350 percent since Jan. 2.

Yeltsin has taken away many of Rutskoi's official duties, but due to the fact that he was elected by Russian voters he retains his vice presidency.

Rutskoi gave no solution to his criticisms.

RSA and ACS blood drive does not reach desired goal

By CHRISTINE FINGERHUT
Staff Reporter

The Resident Student Association (RSA) and the Association of Commuting Students (ACS) sponsored a three-day blood drive, Feb. 4-6 in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

The goal of the blood drive was 150 pints of blood a day, but the goal was not met, said Sue Kukoda, a head nurse with the Red Cross.

The procedure for donating blood is a simple yet precautionary one, she said. Anyone interested in donating blood is asked to fill out a registration form, and a nurse asks all prospective donors several questions, many of which are sexual history questions related to AIDS, Kukoda said.

There is a self-exclusion form for AIDS which a donor can anonymously fill out if he or she has knowingly been exposed to AIDS, so that the donated blood will be taken off the shelf and not distributed to area hospitals.

Prospective donors are also given a physical to check blood pressure, temperature, pulse and hemoglobin count. For each of these tests there are criterion to be met, and failure to do so may result in a temporary deferral to give blood, Kukoda said.

> The blood drive sponsored by Alpha Tau Omega in November 1991 collected 407 pints of blood, equivalent to helping 1221 area patients.
> Sue Kukoda, a head nurse with the Red Cross

Provided the donor is in good health, one pint of blood is donated. The donor is asked to sit for 15 minutes afterwards to consume fluids, pretzels and donuts to prevent fainting, Kukoda added.

All of the blood collected from the drive goes to Center City Philadelphia for testing and is distributed to area hospitals.

According to Andrea Dunn, a college specialist with the Red Cross who coordinates the campus blood drives for both Temple University and Villanova, one pint of blood can be used for three different patients.

The blood drive sponsored by Alpha Tau Omega in November 1991 collected 407 pints of blood, equivalent to helping 1,221 area patients. A similar blood drive held at Temple, which is four times as large as Villanova collected 242 pints of blood.

The University has successful blood drives because of the many active student organizations which sponsor the blood drives on campus, said Dunn. Villanova usually comes within 85 to 95 percent of its goal while Temple usually comes within 65 to 75 percent of its goal, she added.

"In general, college students are really good blood donors, and they account for nine percent of all donations in the area," said Dunn.

A blood drive to be sponsored by Alpha Tau Omega will take place in April.

Five-year plan to downsize enrollment announced

By JENNIFER JANAS
Staff Reporter

The University plans to downsize enrollment from 6,300 to 5,700 students in the next five years in order to maintain the quality of the University. According to the Rev. William McGuire, O.S.A., dean of Enrollment Management, the process should be called "right-sizing."

The five-year plan to decrease University enrollment will reduce additional expenses.

McGuire lists some of these expenses as classrooms and dormitory space. The University can accommodate 5,700 students with its current classroom and dorm space, said McGuire. By downsizing, the University can maintain the quality of its classes and students, he said.

McGuire outlined the five-year plan as beginning with this year's graduating seniors and ending with the class of 1996. The graduating seniors started with a class of approximately 200 more than the normal class size. When they graduate, the next class will start with 70 less freshmen.

As enrollment decreases, the next four freshmen classes also will take fewer students. At this time the enrollment should be around the target size of 5,700 students.

Rather than having a negative effect, the downsizing will be positive, said McGuire. The incoming classes will be more competitive and the class quality will be maintained. Since there are fewer high school seniors from which to choose, "rightsizing" will create classes with better students, McGuire added.

> The goal of the five-year plan to decrease enrollment is quality maintenance.

> Rev. William McGuire, O.S.A., dean of Enrollment Management

The goal of the five-year plan to decrease enrollment is quality maintenance, said McGuire. By keeping enrollment at 5,700, the University will be more competitive and keep the quality of its programs intact, he said.

Public Safety vehicle gets stuck in south campus mud

By JIM ROWLEY
Staff Reporter

A Villanova Public Safety vehicle slid out of control and onto the grass alongside the tennis court Jan. 30. No one was injured in the accident and no cars were damaged.

The incident occurred at approximately 2:30 a.m. when a Public Safety officer followed a small group of students walking. The vehicle reportedly encountered wet pavement, bounced over the curb and became stuck in the mud. A tow truck was required to extricate the car.

Director of Public Safety Jeffrey Horton explained that the officer, thinking the students may have been involved in criminal activity, "wanted to get a better look at" the potential perpetrators. The students were apprehended by other officers and cited for underage drinking, he said.

Horton said the unnamed officer was embarrassed. "He admitted to me what he had done, and I accepted his apology," Horton added.

Horton said the officer was not in "hot pursuit," adding that "we just don't do that."

The car was several feet beyond the roadway with all four wheels stuck in mud.

Penna. task force fights drug abuse

Courtesy of Pennsylvania Association of Colleges and Universities

To combat the abuse of alcohol on college campuses in Pennsylvania, a presidential task force has included among its recommendations that colleges and universities not permit brewery company advertising or sponsorship of events on their campus; the federal government exerts control over the advertising of alcoholic beverages on radio and television; and every educational institution set up housing alternatives, or wellness wings, free of alcohol, other substances and tobacco for interested students.

These recommendations were included in a final report released Feb. 10 by the Presidential Task Force on Substance Use Issues on Pennsylvania College and University Campuses.

"Alcohol is the most widely used 'drug of choice' on college campuses today and we cannot solve the drug problem until we solve the alcohol problem," said Dr. Peter Likins, task force chairman and president of Lehigh University.

"Alcohol is an underlying influence in most acts of vandalism and violence [including rape] on college campuses, and the incipient cause of death in automobile and other accidents for college-age youths," he said.

The presidential task force, consisting of members from the health and education professions, was formed by the Pennsylvania Association of Colleges and Universities (PACU) two years ago at the request of the secretary of the Pennsylvania Department of Health.

In its report, entitled "Drugs On Campus at the Bimillennium [year 2000]," the members urged higher education institutions to ban alcohol advertising in their publications and "decline brewery sponsorship of sporting events on campus."

"Such sponsorship directly promotes use and indirectly fosters the belief that alcohol and sports are naturally related," according to the report.

The task force, in a recommendation to the federal government, emphasized that all alcoholic beverage advertising be prohibited or regulated for conformity with approved standards.

Standards mentioned included those adopted by the Wine Institute and the Century Council, which are "generally practiced for wines, but not for beer or wine coolers."

The study also called on the state to ban the retail sale of pure grain alcohol. "There is no legitimate need for the general public to have ready access to a drug used primarily by college students to 'spike the punch,' " it concluded.

The task force, in what is believed to be the first statewide study done on drug abuse on college campuses, also described a number of campus responses to control the use of alcohol, marijuana, cocaine and other drugs.

Each campus, the report noted, should develop a Coordinated Primary Prevention Program (CPPP). Involved in the program would be all members of the campus community, promoting the proposed theme that "Being Out Of Control Is Never Smart."

Key to success of the program would be the employment on each campus of a full-time prevention specialist. This person would guarantee that up-to-date research, legislation and resources are readily available to the campus community.

The staff member also would serve as an adviser to the president on alcohol and other drug issues.

The task force also recommended that every institution establish an interdisciplinary group responsible for developing and implementing a comprehen-

Students observe Black Cultural Week Activities

By ELIZABETH BARSZCZEWSKI
Assistant News Editor

The Black Cultural Society sponsored a week of programs, lectures and special events to commemorate the second annual Black Cultural Week, Feb. 10-16.

The week's activities included a night of African cuisine, poetry readings and lectures which helped to inform those attending about African-American culture and ideals.

The week's activities began with a night of African cuisine and an awards ceremony. Those attending the event, held in St. Mary's Library, sampled dishes from Africa and honored members of the Black community who made an impact in the furthering of Black ideas and goal.

A night of special poetry took place Feb. 11 featuring poems by African-American poets about the African-American experience.

The Black Cultural Society sponsored two lectures during the week. The society organized a dialogue Feb. 12 entitled, "Black Men — The African American Family in Transition." The society also hosted a discussion presented by guest speaker Maurice Henderson called, "New African-American Agenda — The 21st Century."

The week's events will convene today with a Valentine's Day party held in the Alumni Hall Gym.

The turnout for the various activities was considerable. Black Cultural Week allowed "the campus to be more aware of the things we do," said Michele Damas, first vice president of the Black Cultural Society.

Although activities as those sponsored by the society help to raise the collective consciousness of the campus, there is still much trepidation when it comes to exploring the customs and ideas of another culture, said Damas. There are many questions which people are scared to ask and scared to hear the answers to, she said.

Attorney speaks on Greek liability

By CHRISTA MRUZ
Staff Writer

Criminal defense attorney Mitch Crane spoke about Risk Management for Greeks at a lecture sponsored by Fiji fraternity, the Panhellenic Council and the Interfraternity Council (IFC) Feb. 11.

"The purpose of the lecture was to promote education on Risk Management for the entire Greek community," said Fiji Fraternity President Tom Benjamin.

> When you are a guest at someone else's house, it is their obligation to protect you. If you are not protected, it is your right to file suit against the residents, even if it is your own fraternity.
> Mitch Crane,
> Criminal defense attorney

Crane said he sees many personal injury cases as a criminal defense attorney in Chester County. His speech concerning Risk Management for Greeks focused on fraternity liability.

"When you are a guest at someone else's house, it is their obligation to protect you," said Crane. "If you are not protected, it is you're right to file suit against the residents, even if it is your own fraternity," he added.

IFC recording secretary and Fiji fraternity member Mike Walzak said, "I was very taken back by the stories Crane told. The vividness of what actually happens makes me fearful as to what could happen here."

"Mitch tells it like it is and let's our students know the problems," said Associate Director of Student Activities Gary Bonas.

"Crane used examples which raised some eyebrows," Benjamin said. "The speech was very informative," he added.

"One of the goals of the IFC is to discuss the liability question. I was happy to see how many people came out to attend the lecture to hear Crane speak," Walzak said.

If awareness is raised among the Greek community about Risk Management, then a lecture of this nature is very helpful, said Benjamin.

sive alcohol and other drug program, and provide and require that all students and employees have inexpensive health insurance that will cover standard alcohol and other drug treatment.

> Alcohol is the most widely used 'drug of choice' on college campuses today and we cannot solve the drug problem until we solve the alcohol problem.
> Dr. Peter Likins, task force chairman and president of Lehigh University

The task force also urged the state to enact "Good Samaritan" legislation that would enable colleges to "acknowledge their alcohol and other drug problems without fear of litigation ... increase the state tax on beer, the beverage of choice on college campuses. Beer in Pennsylvania, according to the report, is "accessible, inexpensive" and not taxed as high as in many other states.

Revenue generated by the tax would be used for prevention and treatment of alcoholism and related research. This could include enacting a bottle bill requiring a deposit on all glass and aluminum containers "with the unclaimed deposit dedicated to postsecondary education alcohol and other drug programming."

Although alcohol is the most damaging drug on college campuses, the task force emphasized that it "does not wish to obscure the dangers of the mind-altering substances."

"Many of these drugs present special challenges because they are illegal, expensive and more highly addictive than alcohol. As a result, addicts attract dangerous criminals and may themselves become dealers to support their addiction," according to the task force.

Gary Young, president of PACU, said counselors and substance abuse professionals will be invited to participate in the annual conference and training institute of the Pennsylvania Department of Health's Office of Drug and Alcohol Programs in December 1992.

Culture

Perhaps people feel alienated by the fact that "we are a Black Cultural Society," said Damas. Many times, students will hear about an activity or event and want to get involved until they hear that it is sponsored by the Black Cultural Society, she added.

"We welcome all. It's not a student union. It's a cultural society. We'd like to learn more about other people as we'd like them to learn more about us," Damas said.

Alcohol Awareness events

A poster competition depicting alternatives to substance use is scheduled for Feb. 22 from 10 a.m.-12 p.m. in the Alumni Hall gymnasium, followed by a giant Twister game, sponsored by Student Government, also in the Alumni Hall gym from 1-4 p.m. Also, students will participate in an aerobics marathon from 11 a.m.-3 p.m. in the North Gallery of duPont Pavilion, according to a University Press Release.

Other weekend activities include Bingo sponsored by the Association of Commuting Students (ACS), a fashion show sponsored by the Student Programming Council and a movie marathon at the Center for Alcohol and Drug Assistance in the basement of Stanford Hall, said Hincken.

Residence Life donations, Student Government advertising, Connelly Center assistance, Student Programming Council support and Jim Bonner from Public Safety were "instrumental in putting together the weekend," said Hincken.

A national Alcohol Awareness Week takes place annually in October, said Hincken. Villanova decided to disassociate with this event, because the week was sponsored by a beer company, she said.

Foreign language curriculum centers on student needs

By JANET KEMPLE
Staff Reporter

A lecture given by Dr. M. Mahdi Alosh Feb. 6 focused on the need to develop a foreign language curriculum centered on the students, with a goal of producing conversational fluency.

Alosh, a native of Syria who now teaches at Ohio State University, stressed the creation of a "language learning environment" in which grammar is relegated to a secondary role. His method of teaching emphasizes oral communication in the classroom, with frequent repetition of phrases that students would find useful when speaking with natives. In this way, the learners unconsciously begin to use grammar correctly, though they have never been taught its rules.

Alosh said students can only "learn by doing." Responsibility for learning must be delegated to the students, he said. The teacher's responsibility ends with informing the students of the aides available to them outside of the classroom. It is then up to the students to take advantage of these opportunities, he added.

When planning a curriculum, it is vital to focus on the specific present and future needs of the students, said Alosh.

The instructor must consider why and where the course is being taught, as well as the expected level of proficiency, he said.

With the help of student input, the teachers must set goals and objectives as a pre-requisite to the actual selection of content, he added.

> When planning a curriculum, it is vital to focus on the specific present and future needs of the students.
> Dr. M. Mahdi Alosh,
> Ohio State University

According to Alosh, he uses a "means-ends approach: the content is selected on the basis of the objectives." This content includes the classroom syllabus and audio, video and computer aides outside the classroom, he said.

The final step of this preliminary procedure is the specification of methodology, again using student input to determine which classroom activities would be most useful, Alosh said.

Once the curriculum is determined it should not remain static, said Alosh. Every activity must be evaluated after the fact to judge its merits.

Regular assessment of the students through testing is necessary to decide how well the learning output matches the objectives, Alosh said. If these safeguards reveal a flaw, the instructor must go back and redesign one or more parts of the curriculum, he added.

Visiting Soviet scholar here from Russia

University Press Release

Professor Vyacheslav Y. Belokrenitsky, a faculty member at the Institute of Oriental Studies in Moscow, Russia, joined the political science department of the University as a visiting professor for the spring semester.

Belokrenitsky will teach an undergraduate course and a graduate seminar on Russian politics.

A native of Moscow, the professor earned his undergraduate degree from Moscow University and his doctoral degrees in economics and history at the Institute of Oriental Studies. An expert on the politics of Pakistan and relations between the former Soviet Union and Pakistan, Belokrenitsky has headed the Near and Middle East department at the Institute since 1987. He has also taught at Moscow University.

Arts core curriculum changes and cluster, or complementary, courses, according to Ellis' report.

"We should get the students to see that what they learn in one subject is not divorced from another subject," Doody said in the Chautauqua interview.

The core humanities seminar sequence will emphasize Catholicism and Augustinian material, said Ellis, adding that the classes will be limited to 15 students.

The new core contains 65 credits, three credits less than the old core, and is "flexible so the needs of the students and faculty are accommodated," Ellis said.

A core committee is reviewing the proposals from departments involved with the curriculum. Doody said controversy is always involved with change.

"The main point of contention is that one of the committees decided that the Introduction to Literature courses should be shifted to the second year of the core," said Dr. Phillip Pulsiano, chairman of the English department.

This shift would give students a minimal contact with English, Pulsiano said. The students would take upper level English courses such as British Literature courses during the second year of the core, which would make the introductory courses unnecessary, he added.

The English department is in the process of renegotiating the introductory course back into the first year, said Pulsiano. The department also is deciding on other factors such as common texts and the type of freedom given to instructors, he said.

"No document will be able to answer all questions. Like the Constitution, [the core] has to be interpreted," said Ellis.

The University will implement the new core during a three-year transition period from the fall of 1992 to the fall of 1994, Doody said.

The history department is involved in the core humanities seminar. A new course called "West and the World Since 1750" is required of all students, said Dr. Donald Kelley of the history department. "Western Civilization" will remain as an elective, he added.

Kelley said the history department will be involved in staffing some of the diversity and multiculturalism requirements with a "focus on minorities in the American experience."

Science and mathematics faculty met with Doody this week to decide their part in the new core.

The core committee reviewed proposals on the core humanities program at a meeting Feb. 12. Doody said the curriculum is going through "ongoing changes."

Weekend participants received a free topping with the purchase of ice cream at Connelly Center's Campus Confections and a free lollipop with any purchase at the Connelly Center candy counter by using coupons in the Sibling Weekend brochure.

Mass was held in the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center Feb. 9. Campus Ministry provided singers and eucharistic ministers for the Mass, said DiObilda. The University Shop was also open from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The Villanova Student Musical Theatre gave their performance of "Guys and Dolls" during Sibling Weekend.

The Sibling Weekend committee established a hotline number for any scheduling problems which may have occurred during the weekend and informed students to call Public Safety in the event of any emergencies.

"The actual weekend went by very fast, although the preparation for the weekend was at times tedious," said Horner.

This weekend gave "Villanova students the chance to spend time with their brothers and sisters," Horner said. "Whether they admit it or not, they do miss their brothers and sisters and vice versa," added Horner.

New curriculum poses concern

The University's Core Committee is nearing the end of its four-year investigation of the current core curriculum for possible improvements. The new core curriculum, to be implemented for next year's incoming freshman class, retains the basic structure of the current core but with some changes. For the most part, the changes appear to be improvements, but the changes in the English curriculum are debatable.

The new core curriculum will emphasize communication and writing skills, "with students being required to take at least four writing intensive and four writing enriched courses," according to a Core Committee report. Also, only two semesters, instead of three, will be required by the philosophy, religion and English departments. New requirements include two Humanities Seminar courses focusing on Catholic and Augustinian traditions and a College Ethics course, according to the report.

While the goal of improving the writing skills of students is mandatory, a key oversight in the new program is that required English introduction courses are to be taken in the sophomore year along with upper level courses like British Literature. This adjustment is confusing and senseless. How can a student perform at the expected English writing level as a sophomore if he or she did not take a course during freshman year?

If the main goal of the curriculum is to improve student writing skills, it is not only natural, but imperative that students take a basic "Literature and Composition" course in their first year, let alone at any time.

How can students improve their writing skills if they are not taught by those most suited to teach? A philosophy teacher focuses on Plato and Camus, not grammar and writing style. "Religion and Human Experience" term papers are different from English papers.

The goal of the new curriculum, to improve writing, is necessary to improve student aptitude. But to postpone introductory English is senseless.

Alcohol study misses mark

Do we need a statewide study to tell us that alcohol is the "drug of choice" among Pennsylvania college students? Of course not. Enough students have received underage drinking citations in recent weeks for us to know that alcohol is consumed widely by Villanovans.

We know the problem: a large barrier exists between the written law and student actions. A gaping hole divides township authorities and student residents. We have discussed the issue of alcohol abuse before.

Yet, what do we make of the first-ever statewide study of campus drug abuse? According to the Philadelphia Inquirer, a 35-member panel called for "sweeping measures to deal with the problem." The two-year study called for a ban on alcohol advertising in campus publications, a ban on the sale of grain alcohol, an increase on the state tax on beer and a few other measures that would finance drug and alcohol education on campuses. We wonder if these measures pay more than lip-service to a deeper problem.

Contrary to popular belief, guzzling beer and getting wasted are not part of the "college experience." Getting arrested for underage comsumption is not a rite of passage. The problem transcends the measures that the panel calls for to end substance abuse.

Alcohol abuse will diminish on college campuses only when people work to offer alternatives to drinking. Students need to take the inititative with their peers. Adding a few cents to beer prices, banning grain alcohol and further financing shallow prevention programs are ineffective, bureaucratic approaches. Students need to realize that alcohol is dangerous and deadly.

Issues demand attention, support

To the Editor:

With increasingly large numbers of students living off campus, especially in Ardmore, we do not feel that the University is lending enough support to off-campus residents. In reaction to Aaron Nicodemus' article in his own experience with the police (Jan. 31), we have realized that student discrimation occurs in many places, not only Ardmore.

With the University's inability to house upperclass students, we feel that it is their responsibility to provide an effective means of assistance in dealing with the problems of off-campus living.

This is not an attack on the University, it is merely a plea for help. With the abundance of underclassmen looking for off-campus housing at this time, we feel that it is imperative that they be educated in the realities of off-campus living.

To the Editor:

In response to Carl Baker's letter about the conditions of the athletic facilities (Feb. 7), the "slum lords" would like to set the record straight. Mr. Baker probably does not realize this, but the floors are mopped daily (including weekends). If they are ever dirty, it is because over 100 people walk on them every day.

Would Mr. Baker suggest the janitors mop every other hour? That would be impossible in the middle of the day with all those people in the way.

If anything in the Nevin Field House, DuPont Pavilion or St. Mary's gym is in disrepair, it is because people abuse them. The basketball rims in Nevin have all been replaced in the last two weeks, and new backboards, rims and padding have been put up in St. Mary's. A large number of chairs have been broken because of abuse. The list goes on and on.

We, the crew in charge of making these repairs, suggest Mr. Baker stay up at the Law School until he learns that things tend to fall apart and cannot be maintained without the cooperation of those that use them.

Elections essential to campus community

To the Editor:

As the Student Government elections chairperson this year, I would like to send a message to all students to be aware and active in this important period of the semester.

This year, the elections committee wants to encourage each and every student to vote on April 1. The people who hold these offices will have extensive interaction with faculty and administrators. They will be your voice. Do not let the candidates automatically take on an uncontested voice. Here is an arena where your ideas are important and can change student life at this University.

Please attend one of the informational sessions to find out how to run for office. The meetings will be held in the Day Hop in Dougherty Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 19, and Thursday, Feb. 20, at 8 p.m. The experience can build your interpersonal and leadership skills.

Lastly, make sure to vote on April 1.

COMMENTARY

Students must take responsibility to raise issues

By SAM SHABAN
and NATE NASSIF

There are two major factors that affect the intellectual level at any university. The first of these factors is the quality of the student body while the second embodies the effectiveness of the faculty. What is our assessment of these two points at Villanova University?

Villanova's student body is predominantly homogeneous. The population primarily consists of individuals who are from the same geographic region (86 percent from the East Coast), the same religious background (95 percent Christian), and the same ethnic background (only a 4 percent minority).

> Only by recognizing our weaknesses can we successfully create the type of environment that the Villanova community deserves.

This lack of diversity defies the essence of a liberal education, an education that promotes the development of mental skills and the formation of moral character; progress that may only be achieved in an openly diverse community which the proponents of the core curriculum are working toward.

Because African-Americans make up 2 percent of the student population, one might expect to see a greater move to incorporate their ideas into the curriculum. The fact is, after searching through the master schedule for the Spring semester of 1992, we found only one course that directly deals with African-American studies.

For the 5,985 students that could not schedule "Black America in the Twentieth Century," there comes one day annually, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Day, where they can attend quality lectures and functions that serve to honor King. Unfortunately, we were not able to fully appreciate this day because we had to attend classes and many of the programs were not well advertised.

Many sensitive issues plaguing society today are going unnoticed within our community. Homosexuality and abortion are two issues which engage open debate in society. Why does it seem as though our community limits itself one particular viewpoint? Although the University has its own position which we can respect, the students should be able to freely and openly discuss these matters without undue pressure from either the administration or peers. Is it student apathy?

It seems that this could be the case. Lectures from key speakers often attract a meager turn-out. We have attended several lectures where we and two or three other students constituted the entire audience. We are sure the lecturers return to their respective universities unimpressed and dismayed at the lack of interest amongst the student body.

How many students living on campus feel that curfews are necessary at our level of maturity? It is clear that many students feel that this restriction is unjustified, and demeaning. How many students have attempted to voice their opposition concerning this matter?

The second factor that demands attention concerns the faculty here at Villanova. There are some motivated professors directing classes today on this campus. Unfortunately, some professors are being retained because of their tenure, while other deserving faculty members are being dismissed. For example, we are aware of a professor in the philosophy department, whose teaching abilities earned a runner-up position for the prestigious Lindback award, who will not be returning next year.

Literature and Composition courses are another example of a deficient area within our academic community. The purpose of these classes is to enhance a student's writing ability and knowledge of literature. How can this be accomplished when some professors only require one paper a semester? This lack of writing extinguished the potential for many students to improve their mediocre writing skills.

We discussed the student apathy earlier. Are teachers also falling prey to this deadly disease? Direct experience has proven this to be true. Members of the psychology department felt that correcting writing assignments would demand too much of their time, and therefore assigned none. Once again, this lethargic approach hinders the student's ability to accurately demonstrate their mastery of the subject, because their ability to express their thoughts are snubbed.

Where do we go from here?

Careful criticism are catalysts for progress. Only by recognizing our weaknesses can we successfully create the type of environment that the Villanova community deserves.

ON CAMPUS

Compiled by Sean Iaquinto

Which presidential candidate will you vote for? Why? What issue is of primary concern?

Bill Clinton is my favorite candidate because anything has to be better than Bush. Clinton has a strong democratic agenda with adequate military support, which I like.

Karyn Cella

Senior

I like Patrick Buchanan because I think the United States needs a more conservative stance on economics. I do not think Bush has lived up to my expectations.

Patricia Nohe

Although I am not a citizen of this country, I believe that it is important for [a candidate] to address unemployment as their first concern.

I do not like any of the Democratic candidates, so I will vote for Bush. No one else has impressed me yet.

I favor Bush at this time. The current Democrats are too obscure, and this will lead everyone else to vote for Bush too.

COMMENTARY

Tyson trial displays a biased portrayal of women

By ELLEN GOODMAN

Few of the reporters could resist the boxing metaphors. Mike Tyson, conqueror of so many men, had been brought down by a teenage woman. Iron Mike, who had fought his way to the heavyweight championship, lost the biggest decision of his life, 12-0, to a beauty queen.

Even after the Indianapolis jury had labeled these two clearly as The Rapist and The Victim, there was an undertone to this story that would forever describe them in another way. The Champ and the Woman Who Brought Him Down.

It has been that sort of a year. Not just a year of he-said, she-said, not just a year of sexual politics, but a year in which the one female power on display — or in the ring if you must — is the power to bring a man down.

The judge and the professor. The Kennedy and the nobody. The candidate and the cabaret singer. The champ and the beauty queen. Right or wrong, innocent or guilty, the stories are all different, but the public sex roles have remained constant. In each one there is a man on top and a woman who tries to topple him.

This was not a woman out to pull down a man... She was a victim of violence, a victim of sexual assault.

Even the hit movie of the month seems to imitate life. "The Hand that Rocks the Cradle" is a horror story about a nanny from hell, but there is another subtle scare tactic. The good mother, after all, sets into motion the terrible events that almost destroy her own family when she accuses a doctor of sexual assault.

Plots of male and female power have a special resonance when they are played out in the black community. Most especially when they appear at opposite ends of the black success spectrum: the Supreme Court and the boxing ring.

When Anita Hill spoke up last fall, opponents focused their rage on the idea that she was out to sully Clarence Thomas' success. The judge rode into that nomination on an African American tale of triumph. His was a story of rags to robes. Hill dipped the hems of those robes in sleaze.

Just this month, one woman wrote to Glamour magazine, "If Anita Hill is a Woman of the Year, then an appropriate Man of the Year might be Charles Manson. Both are known for destroying lives."

In turn, when Clarence Thomas talked about a "high-tech lynching" he wasn't just accusing the Senate committee of imitating a Ku Klux Klan meeting. He was painting Anita Hill white. By virtue of testifying against a black man, he implied she had become a traitor of her race.

There were similar themes of race and gender in the Tyson story. During the trial the crowds cheered the champ. There were more than a few in public, though not on the jury, who saw him as a star and her as the villain.

After the verdict, a rumble of remarks about racism were heard in between the boxing metaphors. Some people pointed to a jury of 10 whites and two blacks. Others talked about how this case promoted stereotypes of black rapists. At its extreme, there was the hint that the accuser had fed the fans of racism, not the rapist.

Such issues run deep in the black community, which shares a long history and a concern about the future of young men. There are few male role models in the lives of children and none to waste. Tied into this complicated knot is the notion that if only black woman were more supportive — less independent — black men might be stronger. A black woman standing up for herself is easily charged with bringing a black man down.

The Tyson trial made the news because of the fighter's life story, not the victim's. Tyson was a fatherless child with an alcoholic mother. He was an orphaned teenage thug "saved" from the violence of the streets and trained for the violence of the ring. He became the champ.

Only the success story was never that pretty. Mike Tyson was an assault waiting to happen. Without boxing, he once said, he would have been "in jail — or dead. One of those." In the end boxing was just a detour on his way to jail.

But this was not a woman out to pull down a man, to wipe stardust off his gloves. She was a victim of violence, a victim of sexual assault. Only the saddest twist of roles, the strangest rewrite of Samson and Delilah, can read her as a woman out to beat the big guy.

Spare me the metaphore about boxing rings and knockout punches and female contenders. In the end she was a young woman with courage. The real kind.

'Novans spread a little 'sunshine' to area needy

By SUSAN BURNS
Staff Reporter

A question that has gone unanswered in the minds of Villanovans for so long can now be solved. If involvement steals two to three hours of personal time each week, demands conscientious effort, requires earnest commitment and never earns a pay check, why are over 350 students active in Project Sunshine, a Villanova social action program?

Part of the solution can be found at the Southwest Center, a tutoring establishment in Philadelphia, one of the 13 agencies to which the organization sends volunteers. The answer is in the eyes of 8th grader Shaniece, who said, "My tutors helped me pass the 7th grade," or in the smile of 12-year-old Tiffany, who wants to be a teacher so she can help students, just as her tutor helps her.

Testimony also comes from Jeff, 15, whose tutor has paid extra attention to his math skills for three years. While he admits that gym and lunch are his favorite subjects, he thanks the volunteers for all their help. Seventh grader Diesha said, "I got candy for doing a good job." When she gets older, she wants to be a pediatrician, so she can help others.

"We become good role models for them," said junior Lawrence Martone, of his students at Southwest. "I help them with their academic problems, and I try to be a friend as well, by caring for them as much as possible."

It is this close, personal interaction that adds to the success of the organization which serves financially underprivileged, physically disabled, blind, deaf or multiple handicapped youths and lonely senior citizens in the area.

Winter Olympics start in France

By MAUREEN MEYER
Staff Reporter

All the world's attention will be focused for 16 days on Albertville and its surrounding areas in the French Alps for the 26th Olympic Winter Games. The Savoie region is hosting over 2,300 athletes from 65 countries competing in 57 men's and women's sporting events.

The International Olympic Committee (IOC), which is the governing body of the Olympic Games, selects the host cities six years in advance after a presentation by the mayor of each city wishing to host the games. Following the selection, the organizing committee and the host city work cooperatively to plan the games. France and the IOC have been working together to plan the games for the past six years.

Jean-Claude Killy, co-president of the Olympic Organizing Committee and 1968 Olympic medalist at Grenoble, France, when asked if he would ever organize again, said, "No, never. The first time around is a privilege ... , the second time would be suicide because it is too big on anyone. Ask the people who have done it before me; it's a big job."

In addition to the traditional downhill skiing, hockey, speedskating, figure skating, bobsledding, biathlon, luge and cross-country skiing events, the 1992 Winter Games will feature several demonstration sports. Curling is a sport that is popular in Canada. Competitors slide a 42-pound round rock with a handle toward a target scoring zone 125 feet away. It has been roughly compared to shuffleboard on ice.

Speed skiers, who wear bizarre aerodynamic helmets and suits that take almost an hour to put on, race down runs of hard-packed snow at speeds of over 130 mph. The world record in this event, 139.03 mph, is held by Michael Prufer of Monaco. Two of the three types of freestyle skiing, aerials and ballet, are also demonstration sports.

To be included in the Winter Olympics, a sport must be very popular in at least 25 countries on two continents. In contrast, sports in the Summer Olympics must be popular in 50 countries on three continents.

> The Olympic flag is meant to represent the world peace and friendship that the Olympics promote.

The many changes that have occurred in the world in the past four years were represented in the countries that paraded in the Opening Ceremony in Albertville. Germany is sending only one team in place of separate teams from the East and the West for the first time since 1964.

Five former Soviet republics are marching under the name of the Unified Team, representing the National Olympic Committees of Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan. If any of the athletes from this team wins a gold medal, he or she will hear the Olympic anthem, which this year is Beethovan's "Ode to Joy."

The former Soviet republics of the Baltic region are marching separately as the individual countries of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia. Croatia and Slovenia, having recently declared their independence, are each sending teams distinct from the Yugoslavian team.

The Olympic flag, which can be seen these days in advertisements for almost everything imaginable, is meant to represent the world peace and friendship that the Olympics promote. The interlocking rings of blue, yellow, black, red and green on the flag represent the five continents that compete in the games, with North and South America as one. In addition, every country in the world has at least one of these colors in its own flag.

The Winter Olympics, broadcast this year on CBS with supplementary broadcasting on the cable channel TNT during the day, comprise one of the most widely-watched sporting events on television throughout the world. Many Villanova students will have their televisions on this week to watch the games.

According to one junior, "I am not going to do any work for the next two weeks; all I am going to do is watch the Olympics. History is being made, especially with all of the changes in the teams that are there. And the Olympics only come on every four years; they're really exciting."

Sophomore Alicia Romeo remarked, "In the Winter Olympics, you get to see sports that aren't really that popular in the United States, like luge. I love the speedskating. It's so cool!"

"The Olympics are great. I'm going to spend all of my time watching them," said junior Tiy Smith.

Not all students intend to spend the upcoming week in a spectator coma, but student opinion holds the games in high regard. Though any diversion is a welcome relief from winter boredom, the Winter Olympics provide an opportunity to vicariously experience the thrill of a gold medal champion.

'Novans called to ministry

Special to the Villanovan

The tradition of involvement is certainly a strong one at Villanova. Students participate in every aspect of University life. They can be found working in the libraries and cafeterias, giving tours of the campus and also serving the community in the chapel. Students, by the community's recommendation, assume liturgical minister positions in the chapel on campus.

Student liturgical ministers are the individuals who welcome the community as they walk through the doors of the chapel (Ministers of Hospitality), who read relevant passages in the Bible throughout Mass (Lectors), who lead the congregation in song (Ministers of Music) and who help distribute the Eucharist to the congregation (Eucharistic Ministers). Presiders, who must be priests, are the only spots not available to students.

The community was asked in mid-December to nominate students full of maturity, leadership potential, commitment and, if relevant, some musical ability. Lectors and Ministers of Music are only allowed to serve one year because of the great number of nominations received. Non-Catholic students may be nominated for any position except Eucharistic Minister.

Women have officially been allowed to take place in Catholic church services since 1965. According to Beth Hassel, P.B.V.M., Philadelphia only caught on to this notion 11 years ago, but now women are gladly accepted and welcomed into this service.

The nominees were notified and met for the first time on Feb. 5. The Liturgical Ministers Formation Program will begin Feb. 25 to help students decide if they are willing to accept the position, involving a series of meetings, retreats, and training. There will be a Commitment Mass in April where students publicly declare their desire to take on the responsibility. The Ministers' terms begin in the fall with an all-day retreat, after which they are publicly commissioned.

"The benefits to the community from the services provided by these ministers are immeasurable. However, the ministers themselves are also the recipients of many invaluable benefits. The community building and bonding that occurs through this program creates strong and valuable friendships," said Gary Stegall, the associate director of Campus Ministry.

Summer program targets U.S. history lovers

Special to the Villanovan

Everyone has been schooled in the importance of history in our lives, but how many people actually appreciate the truth in this idea? Believe it or not, many people enjoy delving into the events of our past. If you have ever been called a history buff or you believe you hold an innate appreciation of art, then spend the summer in Historic Deerfield and cultivate your talents.

This spring six to 10 college undergraduates from across the nation will be awarded scholarships to attend the Historic Deerfield Summer Fellowship Program in early American history and material culture. For the 37th year a select group of students will live in Deerfield, Mass., from mid-June to mid-August while participating in the program. The fellowship includes an intensive examination of early American history, architecture, decorative arts, museum interpretation and museum operations.

Kenneth Hafertepe, director of Academic Programs at Historic Deerfield, will direct the 1992 program. He will share teaching responsibilities with visiting lecturers as well as the curators and other members of the professional museum staff of Historic Deerfield, Inc., a museum of New England history and art. Participants will also make field trips to other museums, including Old-Sturbridge Village, Plymouth Plantation, Colonial Williamsburg and Winterthur. These trips include meeting with museum staff members for in-depth discussions of their interpretive philosophies. Students will also undertake a research project utilizing the rich museum and library collections of Historic Deerfield.

Participants in the Summer Fellowship Program during the last 36 years have come from over 100 colleges and universities across the country. Undergraduate majors have included anthropology, art history, history, literature, folklore and American studies. Many students have subsequently pursued graduate study and have gone on to hold positions at such institutions as the Smithsonian, the Getty Museum, Monticello, the Chicago Historical Society, Boston University and the University of Pennsylvania.

Each applicant appointed to the program is awarded a $4,100

Heart Day, go away

By KAREN CAMPBELL
Features Editor

It's inescapable. It's predictable. It's touchingly romantic or simperingly sweet. And whether you consider yourself part of a cuddly couple or are secure in your unattached status, Valentine's Day forces us to come face-to-face with the saccharine sentiments of love.

Have you ever pasted on a sugary grin to cover the loathing you felt when seeing yet another cherubic Cupid, or felt compelled to scrawl nasty notes inside Valentines? In years past, many have suffered through Valentine's Day amid candy hearts, gaudy balloons and Hallmark's professions of undying love.

But this year you can rebel against love-blinded norms. Take pity upon those immersed in hearts, flowers and soulful glances. Unleash your disgust and join the ranks of those who have discovered some alternatives to the syrupy customs of Valentine's Day.

Create your own Valentines. Face it, even Shoebox greeting cards do not cater to every occasion. If you cannot find the perfect card to express your utter abhorrence of Valentine's Day, give your creative impulses free reign and design your own. Start with an appropriate artistic rendition on the front ... perhaps depicting an actual pulmonary organ would be gory enough. Then pen a trite verse inside the card such as, "All roses will wither/And violets too/So I won't waste my money/To gratify you. Have an awful Valentine's Day!" Freely distribute these works of creative genius to anyone wearing Valentine paraphernalia.

Send unique Valentine's gifts. If lovers can exchange chocolate to signify their adoration, you can use this opportunity to come up with some more unusual culinary expressions of your distaste. Some distinctive combinations include chocolate-covered pickles, caviar 'n' cream ice cream, peanut butter-and-sauerkraut sandwiches, pig-knuckle pizza and calves-brain souffle. Packaging these could be tricky, but a little leakage could only serve to enhance the overall message of the gift.

Sexy lingerie is another symbol of romantic affection, but one that can be combatted through your own un-Valentine's Day gifts. Send full-length flannel pajamas or bulky long underwear to your Valentine's Day target. An itchy hair-shirt or sackcloth and ashes are also popular choices that can really communicate the theme of your Valentine's Day intentions.

Villanova Viewpoint: Students react to JFK tragedy

By PEGGY AGOLINO
and GRETCHEN FISHER
Assistant Features Editors

Who really murdered John F. Kennedy? For two decades, the American people thought Kennedy's assassin was paid in kind just shortly after he shot our president. Lee Harvey Oswald was never given the chance to tell his side of the story, but the secrets that were buried with him are gradually being brought to light.

Robert Groden, a leading expert on the evidence surrounding the Kennedy assassination, recently lectured at Villanova. The large turn-out demonstrated that every generation is interested in knowing the truth of what happened that fateful day in Dallas. The old questions are being asked again. This research and the wave of publicity surrounding Oliver Stone's new movie, "JFK," has caused the American public to become increasingly unsatisfied with the original determination.

After the assassination of JFK, rumors about a conspiracy began circulating. But for some reason, no concrete evidence was ever presented to the public. Notions that the CIA and the mob were involved never developed into accusations, nor did those implicating Richard Nixon and Lyndon B. Johnson in the assassination.

The question stands — Did Lee Harvey Oswald act alone? Or was he simply a scapegoat for others much more powerful than he?

Some members of the Villanova community have strong opinions regarding this event. "I think that there are too many discrepancies in the Warren Report to believe it," said sophomore philosophy/psychology major Mike Grosso.

Sophomore accounting major Rebecca Allen agrees. "There's no way Lee Harvey Oswald acted alone. I think the government was involved — they changed sworn testimonies and closed the entire investigation until 2029, when everyone who could be charged will be dead. Even then the truth will not come out."

Freshman Dan McGoey is one of the few students who still believes Oswald acted on his own. Another freshman who wished to remain anonymous believed that the event was a freak, albeit unfortunate, occurrence. "I think it was the same situation as in the deaths of Lincoln and Martin Luther King, and the attempt on Reagan," the freshman biology major said.

Dr. Ted Gladue, a professor in the political science department, said, "I tend to think there was a conspiracy. Someday we might unravel the truth, but it is not yet known. I don't think Oswald was the lone gunman, and with the tensions surrounding the trip to Dallas, it is odd that more precautions were not taken."

Sophomore Scott Holloway became more interested in the event after seeing the movie "JFK." "Although the movie 'JFK' cannot be taken as the absolute truth, it raises some serious questions about the assassination and our government," said Holloway.

"I think he was set up. The movie doesn't justify everything, but it accentuates that there was definitely a conspiracy. The movie made me start thinking about whether the case should have been dropped or not," said Karen Pilney, a freshman engineering student.

Maria Castaldo, a senior honors major, points to all "the shady characters" associated with Kennedy and the event, such as Sam Giancana, the head of the Chicago mob at the time, Fidel Castro, Peter Lawford, Jimmy Hoffa, Frank Sinatra, Marilyn Monroe and JFK's brother, Robert.

"My gut feeling is that it was a conspiracy — there are too many unsolved mysteries. There is a lack of evidence and no solid answers. We still haven't gotten to the bottom of the incident 29 years after it happened," said Castaldo.

Steve Saba, a junior psychology major, called the mystery the biggest "enigma in America." He said that although he really did not care who shot JFK, he figures it was probably the CIA in conjunction with the mob.

Other students were less serious in their replies. "It was all an elaborate suicide scheme that left the nation in tears and Oliver Stone rich," was the profound response of two sophomores. If you do not believe any of the above scenarios, there is always the possibility that "Kennedy was killed by the ghost of Marilyn Monroe and his homosexual ex-lover in a conspiracy," was the flippant reply of one sophomore.

Although these replies are so off-base as to not even consider, with the amount of evidence the public has seen even 30 years later, no theory can be discounted.

during the past two semesters with one student, 9th grader Mary. She has not only helped her with her work, but also has taught her the basics of the French language. "Over the summer I got a letter from Mary thanking me for helping her. She said I was like her big sister," D'Isabel said. "It was very special."

Clearly, the students at Southwest, the elderly and needy all benefit from the volunteers, but involvement also has reverse effects.

"It allows the University student to reach beyond the confines of a campus to the wider world of human suffering, human pain and unjust situations, and to get involved in them actively," said Therese Wenzel, coordinator of Human Services.

Sophomore Kristin Bernardyn is committing a 4th semester to the program, and said that her experience tutoring has been a totally positive experience. It has made her realize that "we are not here for ourselves, but for each other." She adds that while her participation is for the benefit of the students, she also gets a good feeling from letting them know she cares about them.

The dedication and constancy of the Villanova volunteers has formed a strong social action organization. "Villanova's reputation for Project Sunshine is out on the circuit. Agencies have heard that our volunteers are committed and conscientious," Wenzel said, adding that the office is swamped with requests from organizations for students.

Unfortunately, two vans can handle neither this influx of agency applications nor the overwhelming number of student applications at the start of each semester.

"Project Sunshine sells itself," Wenzel said. "It assists those people in a practical way, it broadens the scope of Villanova students and gives them a deep sense of satisfaction."

These are the attributes which enable Project Sunshine volunteers to realize the answer to the earlier question. For the most part, before students even discover how much their efforts benefit themselves, of greater concern to them is extending themselves for the sake of others.

Celebrate un-Valentine's Day

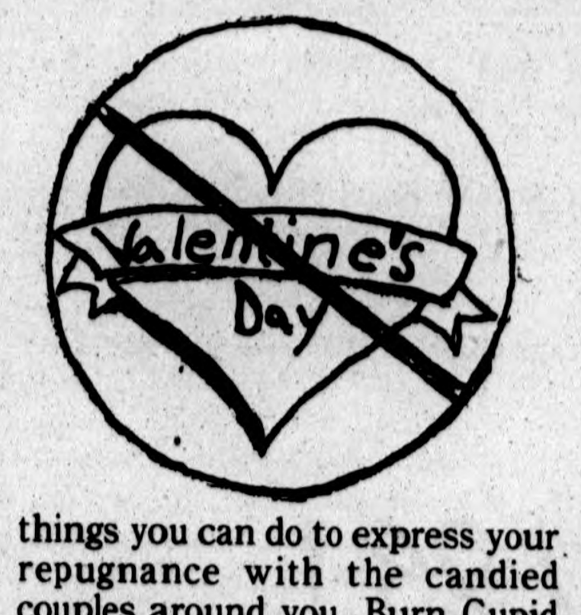
Play the Valentine's Day Dartboard Game. Get a group of your friends together, equally repulsed by "Black Friday," and play the scope dartboard game. Each team scores points by throwing poisoned-tipped darts at the pictures of various opposing team members' objects of unrequited affection, carefully avoiding photos of those desired by your own group. Certain pictures, such as ex-sweethearts, have higher point values. The first team to reach a predetermined endng score wins, but the other team has a chance for a tie by choosing one member to toss three darts into one's own scope. The losing team has to eat an entire bag of those stupid conversation hearts with expressions like "SAY YES." If the losing team does not collapse from sugar-induced heart failure, a new game may be played.

There are also many subtle things you can do to express your repugnance with the candied couples around you. Burn Cupid in effigy. Dress in mourning clothes. Purposely maneuver yourself to bump into any couple you may see sharing an intimate moment. Send the traditional dead flowers or black carnations to someone now out of your favor. Intercept delivered flowers and deliver them to confused passers-by. Approach anyone enjoying Valentine's Day chocolate, stare knowingly and utter a short "Tsk," shake your head and walk away. One syllable is enough to impart a world of guilt.



Do your part to bring about absolute misery to the entire Valentine's Day experience. Sabotage happy couples by strategically placing suggestive notes to mystery Valentines in places in which discovery is inevitable, then sit back and watch the fun begin. After all, Valentine's Day does not have to be a total waste of time.

Deerfield, now over 300 years old, was for 50 years a frontier outpost. A devastating French and Indian attack in 1704 left villagers with an acute awareness of the past and a particular interest in preserving artifacts of their history. 'Guys and Dolls' heats up stage

Villanova's Student Musical Theater performed "Guys and Dolls" Feb. 6, 7 and 8.

The Villanova Student Musical Theater's second full musical production, "Guys and Dolls," was a great hit as it played last week at the Haverford School's Centennial Hall. The production, directed by former Villanova graduate theater student Beth Dannenfelser and musically directed by John Dunphy, is set in New York in the 1940s. The members of the Save-A-Soul Mission, led by the devout Sarah Brown, diligently try to reform the gamblers of Broadway, organized by Nathan Detroit.

Both Sarah and Nathan are kept from their respective agendas by their romantic counterparts, Sky Masterson and Miss Adelaide. The musical featured Rebecca Schoenike as Sarah Brown, Michael Monks as Nathan Detroit, Daniel Giacobbe as Sky Masterson and Germaine Asuncion as Miss Adelaide. All of these actors performed well, displaying dance and vocal talent in both solo numbers and duets.

Miss Adelaide, the lead singer/dancer for the Hot Box Girls, has been engaged to Nathan Detroit for 14 years. Her mission is to get married. This results in an amusing lament, and some quick thinking on Nathan's part after his gambler friends use his eminent wedding as a cover story. Miss Adelaide's Hot Box dancers put on a great show each time they performed, with "Take Back Your Mink" as an especially revealing number.

Sarah Brown eventually gets Sky to "follow the fold" after he saves her mission by winning a bet. The gamblers and the missioners round out the cast of this musical with stand-out vocal performances by Kasi Patterson as Nicely-Nicely Johnson. Vince LaMonica as Arvide and John Castano as Benny Southstreet and featured dance performances by Rebecca Doyle and Tom DeSantos.

The sets were particularly outstanding. The backdrops were gorgeous in color and detail, as were the props. The settings changed quickly yet smoothly from Broadway, to Havana, back to the inside of the mission. The choreography, done by Lauren Kerstetter, in the Havana scene was hilarious and the costumes by Heather Backenstose were striking. Judging from the reaction of the audiences, the Student Musical Theater can look back on its second full production with pride.

VILLANOVA

After having converted to FM during the past year, Villanova's radio station WXVU boasts a firmly established range of programming, a large staff of approximately 30 deejays, a capable technical crew and a fast-growing audience. The few technical problems posed by the conversion have been ironed out, according to chief engineer Mark Tomcavage, and WXVU now transmits at 89.1 FM Tuesdays and Thursdays all day, Saturday evenings and Sunday mornings. The station continues its cooperative use of the FM frequency with Cabrini College and broadcasts at 640 AM on "off days."

Although music director Jon Dean describes WXVU's general program as a standard college radio alternative music format, other types of shows are offered. On Saturday evenings from 9 p.m. to 2 a.m. acting general manager David Burger plays a selection of heavy metal. On Sundays from 10 a.m. to 12 p.m., the station provides a call-in talk show hosted by Mat Toenniessen, which recently featured Student Government President Mark O'Rourke as a guest. Ryan Fannon's sports show airs Tuesdays 3 to 4 p.m. A public affairs show slated for Thursday afternoon is also being planned and suggestions from members of the local community are now being accepted by the station.

Burger hopes eventually to have limited broadcast time at 89.1 and to use a different frequency on "off days" which would only be received on campus. The AM frequency would be maintained as a training ground for novice disc jockeys. The staff is also seeking increased involvement in off-the-air projects as exemplified by their recent record sale and mobile music board work. They have done such work in the past, playing music for several sorority and fraternity functions, and would like to extend this branch of the station further. WXVU continues to reach out in service to the Villanova community and as Burger comments, "Interest has been solid among the students."

Rockenfield reveals Queensryche mystique

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Queensryche drummer, Scott Rockenfield, spoke to David J. Criblez in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Heavy metal is deteriorating into a violent sexual pit of despair. This trend will continue until the metal begins to rust, finding itself in the 99 cent bin next to the disco 12-inch records. Metal needs a savior whose main weapon is originality and, dare we say, logic. Queensryche has been waiting in the wings for years and it was not until 1991 they got put in the game. With the non-stop touring, revived rendition of their concept LP, Operation: mindcrime and a monster LP, Empire, that would not go away, the metal world realized they had a heavy-weight on their hands. So they sat back and let them rule . . .

VILLANOVAN: Operation: mindcrime is an intense piece. Did the pitfalls and destructive atmosphere in today's society inspire it?

ROCKENFIELD: "Yeah, definitely. It's a fictitious story but it was based around things that were happening in the world. Things with the Reagan administration, corruption in government, corruption in religion, basically manipulation. The message is to take control of what you're doing, don't get manipulated. Choose your own destiny. The story focuses on a kid (Nikki) that gets manipulated by drugs and winds up doing things he would not normally do."

V: Did Hitler's unitary rank have an influence on the character Dr. X (sinister role)?

R: "Yeah, I think so. He's a Hitler-esque type guy. He had a cause that he believed in but went about it in the wrong way. Not that it was a good way to begin with, but in his mind I think it was. He kinda even looks like Hitler (laughs)."

V: How would you compare it to Orson Wells' 1984 "Big Brother" concept?

R: "We never read that before we wrote it . . . which is funny. A lot of people make that comparison."

V: The chemistry between the characters Nikki and Sister Mary are rather intriguing. How do you explain the relationship?

R: "As the story evolves . . . the underground revolution, which is headed by Dr. X, is spreading. Nikki gets involved in it and he discovers that Sister Mary was actually a prostitute, originally. She since got herself involved in the revolution and is now struggling to free herself from it. When Nikki meets her they fall in love. However, the only love she knows of is the bad kind. Therefore she can't handle it and she dies . . . in a mysterious way."

V: How did she die? Suicide or did Dr. X kill her indirectly?

R: "Suicide . . . she gave up all hope."

V: Did Dr. X want to kill Mary to destroy Nikki's hope?

R: "Well, it could have happened that way. The 'who killed Mary story' has many interpretations, that's a popular one and very feasible."

V: What was Dr. X's motive for killing Father William?

R: "Father William was wise to what was happening. He was the religious side of the corruption. He kept turning his head. X wanted to finish him off, so he would not have to deal with him or face him down the road."

V: It is inferred in the end that Nikki recalls everything that has happened while awaking in a hospital bed. Where is he to go from here?

R: "The whole story is a flashback from his hospital bed. He's in a bad position because he's caught. He's confused about what he's done due to the drugs. He's left in an insane asylum rung up on thousands of charges. He's basically finished."

V: What is the state of the world at this point?

R: "Business as usual. Dr. X is still moving ahead, the revolution continues. But, perhaps people will take into account what Nikki did and investigate further. But things have not changed, it could go any way really . . . It could be present day or the future. It could always happen. People could turn against the government, kill to put their own people in power and use drugs to manipulate others. You never know . . .

V: Will their be a sequel to mindcrime?

R: "Who knows . . . not at this time at least. We spoke about it but we always nixed the idea. We were so happy with mindcrime when we did it that to do a sequel it's hard to convince people that it's just as good."

V: When doing the Livecrime piece (a live box set video/cd of mindcrime) how come you didn't simply do a live album with various cuts instead of the straight through show?

R: "We're doing a combination of two. First we did the mindcrime piece to document it by capturing it on film because this is the only tour we'll be doing mindcrime in its entirety. We'll do songs from it in our future shows but not the whole thing. Plus we wanted to give it to our fans. The second live piece, which features songs from Empire and our past LPs, was recorded and will be coming out at the end of this year."

V: Have you found that since Empire and the last tour that interest in you as a band has increased?

R: "Definitely, our whole past record catalog has increased in sales. Mindcrime is platinum plus. I think Empire simply opened alot of people's minds and ears to us."

V: Would you consider mindcrime a rock opera, like the Who's

David Letterman's 'Late Night' turns 10

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"I'm sorry, but this has got to be better than 'L.A. Law,' " smirked David Letterman as his vehicle, "Late Night," turned 10 years-old this year, celebrating at Radio City Music Hall, Feb. 5.

In the crowded era of the late night ratings race, Letterman stands tall and mostly alone. His off-beat humor is his deadly weapon that easily outshines the over-polished Arsenio and grandpa Carson. However, it seems that much of his success is his wise-ass attitude that he has with his guests, creating a spark with various personalities. Ask any Letterman fan, he could have three hardly-known guests and it could be a fantastic show. Why? Because Dave does not play by the rules.

The Rockettes opened the show as Dave, in his signature double-breasted blazer, worked the New York audience to the limit. Balancing his act between new material and old favorite clips, Letterman made the show move at a whirlwind pace.

Letterman anniversary shows are always on the go, showing a variety of past clips. Perhaps the best scenes are those that simply involve Dave and band leader Paul Schaffer carrying on in goofy skits. Dave's day at the beach with his swim-suit model friends, his dropping watermelons, TVs and giant balloons with baked beans off roof tops and even his stunts in Alka-Seltzer/velcro/Rice Chex suits being submerged in water (or milk) are simply priceless. He provides smart humor for the brain and quick wit that is too fast for the norm.

"Late Night" staples Stupid Pet Tricks and Top 10 Lists were tended to. Where else can you see a Golden Retriever shoot baskets, a Terrier attack a vacuum cleaner and a Basset Hound drink milk out of his owner's mouth? "The number one reason we have been on the air for 10 years ... I'm Captain Dave and New York City is my ship of love," cried Letterman.

The standard guest clips predictably arose. Even Bill Murray, Letterman's first guest, made an appearance at the anniversary celebration dancing to the beat of Olivia Newton John's "Physical" as he did 10 years earlier.

A collage of musical guests over the past ten years, from Miles Davis to Eddie Van Halen, were spotlighted as Schaffer grinned ear to ear, merely happy to be in company with the rock star guests. He even compiled his own all-star band for the evening: Steve Vai on guitar, Carol King on piano, Edgar Winter on horns, and a vocal quartet of Emmy Lou Harris, Nanci Griffith, Michelle Shocked and Chrissie Hynde plus Schaffer and his World's Most Dangerous Band. However, the centerpiece performance of "Like a Rolling Stone," by Bob Dylan, in conjunction with the house-band, was unbearable. Unfortunately, Dylan cannot (and should not) sing any longer. His voice is painful as well as undistinguishable. They would have been better off with Schaffer singing or even one of the Pet Trick dogs.

The closing showed a pack of dogs, Molly, Ben and Roy, that once appeared on a Stupid Pet Tricks segment, chasing a small herd of sheep down the aisles of the Music Hall, through the lobby and into a cab. "They're on their way to La Guardia ladies and gentlemen!" shouted Dave as he exited the building and headed to Rockefeller Center to figure skate with Schaffer. This proves one thing, Dave's a weirdo and everybody loves him for it.

David Letterman celebrates 10 years of "Late Night".

Crawford performs the Broadway classics

MICHAEL CRAWFORD performs ANDREW LLOYD WEBBER

By MAURA RURAK
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Legendary music composer Andrew Lloyd Webber has written classic scores for the stage including such hits as "Evita," "Aspects of Love," "Jesus Christ Superstar" and "Cats." Yet perhaps his most recognized and complete project is the sounds of "The Phantom of the Opera," which has graced international stages including Philadelphia's own Forrest Theatre, whose production began Tuesday.

It is difficult to say whether "Phantom" created Michael Crawford or if Crawford created the phantom. Regardless, it was Crawford who starred as the phantom from its opening days on Broadway in 1985. Crawford has since left the world-renowned production to pursue other opportunities including a CD, "Michael Crawford performs Andrew Lloyd Webber."

The Crawford CD is a collection of favorite Broadway pieces from different projects that Webber had a hand in creating. Obviously, Crawford feels most comfortable doing the "Phantom" selections from the passionate ease that is reflected in his voice in "All I Ask Of You." "Wishing You Were Somehow Here Again," and the title track "The Phantom Of The Opera" on which he is joined by Barbara Bonney.

"Gethsemane" from "Jesus Christ Superstar" is a strong and powerful rendition that is backed by The Stephen Hill Singers and The Boys Choir of Harlem. "Memory" takes on a different, although beautiful sound when sung by a man and the upbeat "And The Money Kept Rolling In (And Out)" provides balance and transition. Crawford's infamous "Music Of The Night" that helped to mark his place on Broadway is an important selection that is included on the album.

"Michael Crawford performs Andrew Lloyd Webber" is a complete Broadway album. Included on it are some of the best scores ever written for the stage by the young master. Crawford's voice is smooth and full and the mixture of pieces gives an insight of Webber's work. Although "The Phantom of the Opera" is Crawford's most recognized accomplishment, he shows his versatility and genuine talent by performing a variety of modern classics by Webber.

Funny Bone tickles Philly

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"Welcome to Philadelphia ... Where the streets are so clean people sleep on them," cracked Frank Barnett, Saturday night's emcee of South Street's Funny Bone — the premiere comedy club this side of the Delaware River.

The Funny Bone is the place to catch rising or falling stars as comedians hit or miss on the comedy circuit.

This past Saturday a double bill of Roger Rittenhouse and Robert Schimmel captured the attention of a packed house of joke-hungry Philadelphians. Rittenhouse and Schimmel each had their own styles and quirks that have been telecasted across America on such programs as Comic Strip Live, MTV's Half Hour Comedy Hour and countless others.

"This happened at the Philadelphia petting zoo this morning," claimed Rittenhouse as he raised his severed left hand which was mechanically replaced.

Rittenhouse pushes sarcasm to the limit while remaining cool. He is the guy that cleans out his fridge when kids come to his police-taped house at Halloween. When he calls to complain about a rat in his room at the Budget 8 Motel, they bring him an extra pillow. Or so he says ...

Schimmel was the head gun of the evening. He has had his own Showtime special (with another coming in two months). Although his humor is a bit off-color, his delivery technique is impeccable. "Policeman pulled me over the other day and asked, 'Do you know why I pulled you over?' 'Because I have pot in the glove compartment?' (he answered causally) 'Step out of the car please,' he said. 'No its too cold outside, you come in here,' " said Schimmel.

His persona is Steven Wright meets Bruce Willis, a low-key wiseguy. "Popeye ... what a character. Here's a guy who eats nothing but spinach, smokes it in his pipe and sees battleships on his arms. I mean c'mon, who the hell would fight Bluto for Olive Oyl," quipped the balding comedian.

The majority of Schimmel's act is sexually explicit material for mature adults only. However, it is not as crude as, say, Andrew Dice Clay for the specific reason that it is not communicated in a brash manner. His comments are merely warped observations, "When you die in a plane crash, they are said to identify you by your medical records ... wouldn't they need to know your dentist too?"

The Funny Bone is most enjoyable with a group of friends. Their prices are a bit high (weekend headliners $10-13, weekdays $8) but well worth the ride. There is a two-drink minimum and a small but tasty arrangement of munchies to gnaw on. Up and coming within the next few months are Mark Curry, Dom Irrera, Gilbert Gottfried, George Wallace, Judy Tenuta and Richard Jenny. Call 440-9670 for more information or to reserve tickets ahead of time.

Movie Clips

FATHER OF THE BRIDE: Steve Martin's daughter is getting married and if losing her isn't difficult enough, planning the wedding is an absolute nightmare. This remake of a 1950 classic is a touching comedy featuring a hysterical performance by Martin Short as a wedding organizer. B

FREEJACK: Emilio Estevez is miscast as a racecar driver thrust into the future to contend with a bounty hunter, played by scene-stealing Mick Jagger. The plot does not live up to its potential and wastes the talent of Anthony Hopkins, giving him little dialogue. C

FRIED GREEN TOMATOES: Set in the 1930s South, this is both a portrait of friendship and small town murder mystery. Mary Stuart Masterson and Mary-Louise Parker both give excellent performances but the direction is weak. B-

GRAND CANYON: Focusing on the anxieties of the 40-something generation in Los Angeles, this Lawrence Kasdan film is a follow-up to The Big Chill. The cast is strong, featuring Kevin Kline, Danny Glover, and Steve Martin in a story which causes the self-reflection of the audience. B+

JUICE: A riveting drama about life on the streets of Harlem, this realistic film stars Omar Epps as Q. Sparing the audience none of the violence of ghetto life, director Ernest Dickerson provides a powerfully true portrait of urban crime. B+

SHINING THROUGH: Melanie Griffith and Michael Douglas are spies in love in Nazi Germany, but the story is ruined by a confusing mesh of subplots. Griffith is an inappropriate choice for her role and the film lacks necessary suspense and action to spruce up an overused plot idea. C

'Analysis' rehashes past

By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

It has finally happened. Movie themes, worn-out from almost a century of use and re-use, have come full-circle. Plots, characters and even entire scenes are being borrowed from the classics and the B-rate flicks to create a hodgepodge movie quilt that composes this season's cinematic offerings. Has true originality been lost, or is this yet another result of the recession?

Tne trend started out innocently enough, and only in the average movies. Patrick Bergin replayed his obsessed jealous husband character ("Sleeping With the Enemy") in "Love Crimes." Movies like "Cape Fear" and "Father of the Bride" reworked two classic films, to modest artistic success. "Grand Canyon" is merely the '90s sequel to "The Big Chill."

"Final Analysis" is basically a modern-day recreation of the 1958 Alfred Hitchcock hit, "Vertigo." Richard Gere stars as an astute Freudian psychiatrist who finds himself caught between two sisters, one stunningly beautiful (Kim Basinger) and the other tortured by a violent past (Uma Thurman). As the story progresses, the wicked and cunning plot contrived by the sisters unfolds, but never once does the audience believe a word of what the characters are saying.

Gere, as the aloof Dr. Barr, is supposed to be an intelligent man of science, but he comes off more as a pompous bore who succumbs quickly to his lusty desires. This part has been performed more admirably before, most notably by Barbra Streisand in "The Prince of Tides."

Kim Basinger's role also duplicates one from before: her character loses all control with the slightest amount of alcohol, mimicking her performance in "Blind Date." Even Gere's best friend, a balding lawyer, is so much like Gere's sidekick in "Pretty Woman" that one might swear the movies shared scenes.

"Final Analysis" attempts to recapture the suspense and thrill of Hitchcock's earlier triumphs, but falls way short. The main characters seem to lack conviction, but several of the minor roles shine. As the disturbed sister, Thurman explores the limits of her character, complete with bright insights into its darker corners. The dogged black detective (Keith David) possesses a low raspy voice and determined look that make him perfect. Overall, however, "Final Analysis" cannot revive past successes, nor even find any thrills for itself.

Sean Connery returns to the screen in "Medicine Man" with expert brilliance. He has smoothly made the transition from the debonair James Bond mold of his youth to a more dignified style.

While Connery settled comfortably into the part of an aging lost scientist, Lorraine Bracco, his research assistant, does not fare so well. She is essentially the narrator, but her annoying accent and professional coldness hide behind Connery's shadow.

"Medicine Man" is set deep within a Brazilian jungle that is slowly being deforested by an unscrupulous government and greedy logging companies. The film's strongest statement is a political one, equating the discovery of a cure for cancer with the preservation of the shrinking rainforest. While subtly presented, this theme never progresses throughout the film and eventually becomes redundant.

Even with these weaknesses, "Medicine Man" is decent. The amazing beauty of the rainforest is elegantly captured as Connery and Bracco swing from tree to tree, tethered with modern mountain-climbing gear that contrasts with their wild surroundings. The soundtrack provides the appropriate mood, at times delicate and melodic and at others pounding with reckless fury. "Medicine Man" showcases Connery and the jungle, but its politically motivated theme would do well to hide amongst the thick underbrush.

FAST FORWARD: Spike Lee is working fastidiously on another political statement, "Malcolm X," which will bring the life of the black Muslim extremist to the big screen. Denzel Washington portrays the famous leader.

Out soon is "White Boys Can't Jump," starring Wesley Snipes ("New Jack City," "Jungle Fever") and Woody Harrelson (Woody on TV's "Cheers") in this comic portrayal of the differences between blacks and whites. Look for this one to have none of the edge of a Spike Lee flick, but it may be fun to watch.

ROCK QUARRY

RUN DMC: TOGETHER FOREVER: Run DMC seemed to have been edged off the comfortable couch by rappers like L.L. Cool J., Marky Mark and Hammer. The style Run DMC has cultivated since 1983 has now become what they always despised, old school. However, none of these acts would be anywhere today without Run DMC. They are the parental figure, who gave birth to the first rap-pop-rock combination. They also had a hand in reviving Aerosmith who now holds the record of recently signing the biggest recording contract in history. So a lot of people owe Run DMC.

Respect is what they command and after listening to its greatest hits compilation, Together Forever, one cannot deny its request.

Dating back to 1983 with jams "Rock Box," "It's Like That" and "Hard Times," Run DMC's sound was ground-breaking. However, by the time it reached 1990, it grew stale and came to a standstill.

Desperately trying to keep up with the new rappers such as N.W.A and Ice Cube, Run DMC was ignored. Its 1990 LP, Back From Hell stalled at a young age. Therefore it decided to document the past to remind those who forgot about the "Kings from Queens."

CHEAP TRICK — THE GREATEST HITS: Although it might be a late-'70s post-disco limbo band, Cheap Trick still possess a large amount of talent. The Greatest Hits captures Trick at its best.

The songs are pop classics of its time. "Dream Police," "I Want You To Want Me" (live) and "Tonight It's You" are as sweet as ever. Their honest straight-ahead approach works. There is no gimmick to the act.

The cover tunes are both surprising and disappointing. The revived "Magical Mystery Tour" is almost a second-rate carbon copy that even samples the Beatles' original background vocals. Trick does an outstanding live rendition of "Ain't That A Shame."

Trick's late-'80s comeback fluke was due to America's ballad-bound teens. "The Flame" is what sparked the rise but soon after, the LP drew further away from popularity causing this turn-of-the-head compilation.

TINA TURNER — SIMPLY THE BEST: Tina Turner, once a Phil Spector discovery with husband Ike, is now pausing after seven years of constant attention: magazine covers, awards, tours and albums. Simply the Best marks Turner's historical comeback from the mid-'80s and onward.

It seems her raw energy captivated in her spiked high heels, raspy voice and frazzled hair has yet to be captured. However, writer/producer Terry Britten seems to have found a way.

Her '80s LP, Private Dancer, restored her faith as well as her reputation in the music industry. All those hits and more are sighted in this package.

Her perfectly paired duet with Rod Stewart, "It Takes Two," is the shining moment as the vocalists tear up the Moy/Stevenson tune.

SPECIAL REPORT Michael Jackson announced his plans for his 1992-93 "Dangerous" tour Feb. 2. The tour will be sponsored by Pepsi-Cola International, Jackson's third deal with the soda company. The contract also includes three commercial segments for Pepsi in which Jackson will star.

Starting in London in the month of June, the 18-month-long tour will span Spain, Asia, Australia, Europe and Latin America. This will mark Jackson's first appearance in Eastern Europe.

"The only reason I am going on tour is to raise funds for the newly formed 'Heal the World Foundation,' (named after a Jackson song featured on his latest LP, Dangerous,) "an international children's charity that I am spearheading to assist children and ecology. My goal is to gross $100 million by Christmas. The Foundation will contribute funds to pediatrics for AIDS research in honor of my friend Ryan White," said Jackson at a press conference.

His tour earnings will also go towards Camp Ronald McDonald's Make-A-Wish Foundation and other organizations for children.

No dates in the United States have been announced yet.

Steve Forbert tackles insightful themes

STEVE FORBERT
THE AMERICAN IN ME

By JOHN KAZMIERCZAK
Staff Reporter

Steve Forbert's latest album, The American In Me, is a reflection of many aspects of everyday life, perhaps more so than intended. Although this work tackles themes that are already well-covered musically such as love, despair and the desire for individuality in homogenous society, it does so in a way that alters the potentially dull and ordinary into remarkably insightful pieces. Strong, honest vocals and lyrics rich in imagery are the ingredients Forbert makes use of to achieve this transformation.

Music is not the only medium that Forbert uses to convey his conception; the booklet-printed lyrics include a number of scratchouts, insertions and typos, symbolic of an imperect, just-doing-the-best-you-can nature of life. Forbert also employs an unstructured style of singing, alternatively cramming lyrics together and stretching one- and two-syllable words to make them fit the music. In many ways, the form and packaging of the album reflects its instrinsic themes more than the music itself.

Forbert's world-weary style of singing is well-complemented by a standard background of percussion, bass, electric and acoustic guitars and an occassional keyboard arrangement. Though the album clings mainly to a mellow vocal, guitar and drum formula, one sung, "Rock While I Can Rock" picks up the pace with the help of a superb harmonica solo and vocals resembling a cross between early Elvis, Bruce Springsteen and John Mellencamp.

Unfortunately, not all aspects of life are workable as the basis for a strong and Forbert occasionally fails to make the distinction between the romantic and the mundane. "Changes in The Weather" and "Baby Don't," featuring mediocre themes mated to repetitions.

The outcome of this album is best summarized by the title of the second-to-last track. "You Cannot Win 'Em All." Forbert manages to portray a portray a romantic view of life's experiences through 10 pleasant but not terribly provocative pieces.

Tommy, or rather a concept album?

R: "It's more of a concept album or a live movie, audio movie so to speak."

V: Did you ever consider making it a feature film?

R: "Yeah, we have. Many companies are interested in taking us up on it. Possibly a Broadway stage production . . . we are always thinking of different ideas."

V: Do you have a special mindset playing mindcrime live in comparision to other songs?

R: "I think so because when we get to the point of playing mindcrime in the set, we go through this change. The stage rearranges and the screens come down and all. But just before it starts there's a big pause . . . and it is solid darkness then we kick into it. We change costumes and come out looking tougher. You feel different. It's like one big song for an hour. It brings you through ups and downs."

V: There's a lot of hinting and inferences in mindcrime. Was it supposed to be secretive and left up to the listener to decide?

R: "We don't want to just spell it out. There's a basis for the story but there's also little open doors to explore and that is where the fun lies. If it was straight ahead it would be boring, but this way there's a bit of mystery in it."

V: Your tour has been rather extensive. How long have you been on the road and are you burned out?

R: "No. It's been 15 and a half months. We have seven weeks on and ten days off. So we get revived. We've done over 200 shows. We want to write new stuff. We write on the road a bit but we keep our ideas to ourselves until we get back."

V: What direction do you foresee Queensryche heading?

R: "Our next album will be totally different. We are not the type of band to simply tread water. Many people will expect Empire again but that's not the case. I think it will be more experimental."

V: On Empire you tended to focus on the negativity of society: prostitution, homelessness, violence and emptiness. What made you choose this route?

R: "We had not really done it before. Empire was a phase of our feelings at the time. It was a large collaboration and we kept an open mind. It really was a brain storm. That method worked well I tend to think we will continually use that route."

V: "Silent Lucidity" was a huge hit for Queensryche. How did you handle all immediate and constant attention?

R: "We loved it. We always wanted to get our music to as many people as possible. It was a nice surprise and we did not plan on it. We did not write it to sell. It was simply a less is more technique."

V: People compared you to Pink Floyd because of it. How do you accept that comparison?

R: "It was a compliment. They are an influence. Music has been around so long you can't not be influenced by a band like Floyd. But you can hear a lot of influences in our songs."

V: Was Floyd's The Wall an influence on mindcrime?

R: "Definitely. The Wall was a great concept album and a successful one at that. It was a challenge to us to do a concept album. Our story is very different but hopefully it will stand the test of time."

V: Does Empire suggest the constant greed and to never be satisfied?

R: "It's about the crack problem and how 15-year-old kids can make $1500 a day while a college graduate with a good job will not even bring a tenth of that home to his family. It's backward. People are building empires on drugs and its all fueled by greed. That's America. That's why people move here . . . it's all capital."

Experience is the key element in the music of David Bromberg. Bromberg's career spans more than 25 years, crosses all musical bounds and includes involvement with the projects of many recording artists. The former Columbia University musicology student got his start in the coffee houses of Greenwich Village during its folk music period of the '60s. Bromberg has displayed his talents on more than 100 albums by artists including Ringo Starr, Bob Dylan and Chubby Checker.

The music created by Bromberg reflects his diverse background, possessing a distinct flavor all its own. His solo albums since the release of his debut in 1970 are characterized by a fusion of jazz, folk, bluegrass, rock-n-roll, country, and blues. Bromberg continued using this eclectic style on his most recent release, Sideman Serenade. He blended opposing musical traditions by giving one side a country feel and the other side an urban context. Once again he transformed his project into a talent powerhouse with such backup guests as Jackson Browne, Dr. John, members of Willie Nelson's band, Jorma Kaukonnen, of Jefferson Airplane, and the Jessy Dixon gospel singers.

Bromberg has a technical eloquence which has commanded a reputation for crowd-pleasing performances. He injects his songs with soulful rhythm and authoritative musical flair. Bromberg's live appearances have garnered rave reviews as displays of ground-breaking originality and technical expertise.

He will bring his talents to the Chestnut Cabaret Feb. 20.

FLASH: The Average White Band can be described best as a contradiction in terms. Although it hails from the shores of Scotland, AWB has produced an uncharacteristic American rhythm and blues sound, since its formation in 1972. AWB achieved most of its success in the '70s, but has returned with a new album, Aftershock, to appear at the 23 East Cabaret Feb. 15. Maintaining its category-breaking nature, AWB have enlisted Chaka Khan and former Santana singer Alex Ligertwood for Aftershock.

CFC's Propel Bush

By SCOTT FRIESE
Staff Reporter

Record levels of ozone depletion have been reported to be found over the northern hemisphere. The study, issued by a team of NASA scientists, was released Feb. 3 and has triggered a surprise response from the Bush administration.

Destructive chemicals called chlorofluorocarbons, (CFC's) are found in household products as common as refrigerants and aerosol sprays, and when used CFC's are released into the atmosphere forming ozone-killing chemicals called chlorine monoxide.

Ozone, a chemical found in the upper atmosphere, protects the earth and its inhabitants from unhealthy levels of ultraviolet radiation from the sun. When chlorine molecules are released, they engage in an ozone-destroying chemical reaction begun by sunlight.

Ozone depletion has been recorded over the Antarctic for the past five winters. (Currently, the hole over the South Pole has been stripped of 50 percent of its ozone.) But the recently released six-month study reported that ozone depletion is no longer just a problem over the Antarctic. In fact, preliminary studies indicate the possibility of a hole developing over populated parts of the United States, Canada and Europe.

Dr. Mames G. Anderson, a Harvard University chemistry professor involved in the study, was recently quoted in the New York Times as saying, "We believe now that the probability of significant ozone loss taking place any given year is higher than we believed before."

Efforts to limit the use of CFC's have been made throughout the political, economic and scientific international community for years. In 1987, the Montreal Protocol was signed, calling for production of CFC's to cease by the year 2000. The United States, politically and economically one of the most powerful nations in the world, has not recognized their responsibility to aid the rest of the world in this field.

> The world has come calling and the United States is found as uncooperative as cranky children that do not want to clean their rooms.

Until the results of this study were released, the ozone depletion issues were "the other guy's problem." A hole in the ozone that appeared each winter over the Antarctic did not directly threaten the U.S.' interests. The United States has refused to cooperate with more socially responsible nations, as well as environmental groups throughout the world, in finding a solution to such a threatening problem.

It took a threat in his own backyard to make President Bush to act. If scientists are correct in their estimation of a decrease in ozone above the northern hemisphere, ozone in this region may be destroyed at the rate of 1-2 percent a day during the winter months when the sun hits the atmosphere at the proper angles.

Consequently, in a surprising change of public position on the environment, Bush encouraged Senate action to speed up the phase-out of ozone-depleting chemicals. The Senate then passed an amendment to the energy bill that declares that ozone depletion is occurring at two times the rate previously believed.

What is necessary in halting the detrimental effects of CFC's in the atmosphere's ozone is action to be taken against those industries which, through the daily course of their business, produce goods that release such chemicals. To take a stand against this segment of American society is to upset a large block of workers. Translation: anger those whose livelihood depends on CFC use and production will cause one to lose votes.

Sen. Al Gore of Tennessee, author of the amendment, was quoted in response to Bush's reaction, "It is easy enough, after the ozone hole is pointed to and predicated above Kennebunkport, to say, O.K., we will now think seriously about doing something."

Indeed, not until the ozone problem pulled at Bush's heartstrings did he see it necessary to act. The world has come calling and the United States is found as uncooperative as cranky children that do not want to clean their rooms. Well, it is time to take responsibility and Bush, "the environmental president," must recognize the need to do something positive — even if it means losing votes.

Jobs working for Earth

By ERIC CHEUNG
Staff Reporter

Nine Villanova Environmental Group (VEG) members went to the Ashland Nature Center in Delaware for an Environmental Careers Conference Feb. 11. During this eventful day, guests could choose from many environmental workshops, ranging from solar power to solid waste management. Each offered important avenues for those pursuing environmentally-related careers.

Earl Shaver, of DNREC (an ecologically-related company), discussed the dangers of soil erosion. He stressed the many possible jobs associated with soil erosion control, including testing of river pollution and developing methods for ground stabilization. His main message was for people to first get an education, then a job working with the environment and maneuvering their way into the specific area they wish to perform.

Another notable speaker was James Power, who worked towards the development of solar power. He discussed the many opportunities our generation will have with solar energy. Already most people understand the importance of resource conservation but the economic costs make solar power options less desirable. His belief is that we can find a way to make it work efficiently and with less cost. In four years, the solar energy industry is bound to open up new employment opportunities, he said.

Other speakers had more to say on job possibilities. Terry Higgins of Wesley College advocated environmental consulting as a challenging job where one is required to balance Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) regulations with the interests of the client. Wayne Lehman, a DNREC employee, spoke of the potential in wildlife management, including field work as a researcher and administrative tasks as a manager.

Meteorology was Kirk Lombardy's specialty. He said that forecasting and technical jobs were among the choices for those who found an interest in the atmosphere. Denise Keehner presented solid waste management arguments but primarily advocated her position with the EPA and was enthusiastic about the explosive job opportunities in the agency. These opportunities included field jobs and policy-making work, but since this was a regulatory agency, enforcement was still another possibility.

V.E.G. members traveled to Ashland Nature Center in Delaware for an environmental careers Feb. 11 conference. Presentations were made in numerous fields including Lisa Gelvin-Innyaer's description of Marine Biology.

Smart recycling stops waste

By BARBARA SULLIVAN
Staff Reporter

Recycling became Pennsylvania law in July 1988 when Gov. Robert Casey signed Act 101, The Municipiple Waste Planning, Recycling and Waste Reduction Act. Eight million people in 408 communities and all state agencies will be participating in recycling programs in Pennsylvania this year. This program expects to reduce municipal solid waste by 25 percent statewide by 1997.

Most of us are already accustomed to the process of separating materials for recycling. Recycling bins for aluminum cans, glass bottles and newspapers have become a familiar sight on campus. Recycling works not only to reuse precious materials, but is becoming an industry in itself and using recyclable materials expends less energy.

New businesses and industries are emerging to take advantage of the new opportunities presented through curb-side recycling programs and resources collected at recycling centers. These materials are sorted and processed for sale to manufacturers. These types of programs can be of benefit to finance the costs of running recycling programs.

Using recycled aluminum and glass expends less energy than to start from scratch. Recycled glass melts at a lower temperature than new glass and aluminum cans made from recycled aluminum use only "a fraction of the energy needed to make one from ore." Recycled glass is less taxing on glass-making equipment and helps give the equipment longer life.

In Pennsylvania recyclable materials include: clear glass, colored glass, high-grade office paper, newsprint, corrugated paper, aluminum, steel and bimetallic cans and plastic. When recycling, sort the materials, rinse beverage and food containers, crush aluminum and plastic bottles to save space if needed (but not glass), and try to buy products which use recycled materials.

Thinking ahead while shopping will help create less waste. Buying reusable products or recycled packaging in the largest possible size will help reduce trash.

'Nova signs four

By RYAN FANNON
Staff Reporter

The Villanova basketball team has received three letters of intent and one verbal commitment for the incoming freshman class. The recruiting class consists of a point guard, shooting guard and two projected wing players.

The first player to sign with the Cats in the early fall signing period was Roscoe Harris, a 6-foot-4 shooting guard out of Marist High School in Bayonne, N.J. According to Marist Head Coach Joe Forenza, "Roscoe is a great standstill shooter, whose shot off the dribble as well as his defense has continued to improve throughout his senior year." Roscoe was ranked as the ninth-best shooting guard in the country going into this season according to Bob Gibbons, considered the top analyst of high school basketball talent in the country. Harris is averaging 21 points and seven rebounds per game this year while shooting 67 percent from the floor.

> Thomas is a very quick, creative point guard who is our team's best defender as well as our leading scorer.
> Head Coach Ben Calandrillo

The next signee for Villanova was 6-foot-5 Kerry Kittles out of St. Augustine High School in New Orleans. Kittles, projected as a wing player at 'Nova, is currently averaging 25 points and 10 rebounds per game this season. Head Coach Bernard Griffin said, "Kerry is an extremely versatile player who can score both inside and from the perimeter as well." Kittles was considered the 67th best player in the country after his junior year, according to Gibbons.

Another wing player landed by Villanova was Eric Ebers out of St. Joseph's Institute in Buffalo. Head Coach Ed Kobierecki stated, "Eric is presently 6-foot-7 and weighs 203, he runs the floor extremely well along with possessing good jumping ability." Ebers, ranked as the 50th best upcoming senior after his junior campaign, is averaging 25 points and 11 rebounds this season and has helped his team to an impressive 12-1 start.

The latest addition to this year's recruting class is Lawrence Thomas from Elizabeth High School in New Jersey. Thomas, who is considered one of the top 10 point guards in the country, verbally committed to Villanova two weeks ago and will sign in the late signing period this spring. Head Coach Ben Calandrillo said, "Thomas is a very quick, creative point guard who is our team's best defender as well as our leading scorer. He chose Villanova because they showed the most interest in him from day one. Thomas had other big-time programs knocking on his door this year such as Indiana, Michigan State, Iowa, and Seton Hall. Lawrence is averaging 21 points, five assists, and two steals this year for us."

Another newcomer to next year's team will be Jonathan Haynes from Germantown Friends School in Philadelphia. Although he practices and travels with the team, Haynes' eligibility will not begin until next year with sophomore basketball status because of his transfer from crosstown rival Temple. Haynes, who is being touted as Villanova's next great point guard by some 'Nova insiders, has incredible high school credentials. Haynes was named to everyone's all-America list, including McDonald's and Street and Smith's. He was also the Gatorade Pennsylvania Player of the Year as well as the Daily News' and the Philadelphia Inquirer's Player of the Year in 1990. The 6-foot-3 guard averaged 33 points, nine assists and seven rebounds his senior year.

The incoming class appears to be loaded with guards, shooters and great quickness. This class is considered to be between the 10th and 15th best recruiting class nationally this year.

Big East exploits athletes

another's talent for personal gain is unethical. But no one ever said college athletics was ethical.

"Hey Alonzo," the Big East says, "we're going to make millions off of your name and talent while you work 20 hours a week to improve your game. You're our meal ticket and, by the way, thanks for staying for your senior year. We're gonna miss you until our next recruits sign up at your school and make us more money."

The coaches at the respective schools make upwards of $300,000 for shoe contracts. Maybe there is a mistake, but don't the players wear those sneakers? When is the last time you saw John Thompson running up and down the sideline in his Nike's?

Everybody seems to be making money, the school, the athletic department, the coaches. Everybody except the athletes, the ones who determine how much money is made by whether or not they can rebound and shoot the three-pointer. Nobody said life was fair. Nobody said the NCAA and the Big East were fair.

But hey, maybe Malik Sealy and Lance Miller get special discounts at their local Kentucky Fried Chicken.

It is time college athletics takes a close look at its hypocritical ways. Because as almighty Dick would say, "That's exploitation with a capital 'E,' baby."

Swimmers prep for Big East

By BOB TRAVISANO
Staff Reporter

The swimming team had arguably its best week of the season with its men's and women's double defeats of Miami and Syracuse. With a 156-86 victory over the Canes and a 141.5-99.5 drubbing of the Orangemen, the men moved to a record of 9-7-1. The women followed suit with victories of 125-118 and 158-86.

These recent victories were of great importance to the team in its run for the Big East title in two weeks. The men realized their ability and were able to defeat tough Big East competition. Also, the women continued their winning ways and lifted their overall record to 11-1-1, which should move them up a few places in the next national poll.

"It should be pretty exciting. It's gonna come down to Pitt and ourselves," Jerry O'Mara said of the Big East. "Syracuse doesn't really have the depth to give us a run for the money."

The usual cast paced both squads in their victories. O'Mara led the way for the men with a first in the 50-yard freestyle and the 100-yard freestyle. Rob Drumm won the 1000-yard freestyle and a second in the 500-yard freestyle. Ed Paradise won in the 200-yard breaststroke and Glen Langhans got the nod in the 200-yard butterfly.

For the women, Lisa Flood got the wins in the 200-yard individual medley and the 200-yard breaststroke. Mary Dowling finished first in the 500-yard freestyle and second in the 1000-yard freestyle, while Eileen Consadine got second in the 200-yard freestyle and Jenny Miller took second in the 200-yard individual medley.

According to O'Mara, the key to winning a big berth in the championship meet may be in the medley relay. "We really need a big relay win to give us the shot in the arm and psyche us up," said O'Mara.

"I think we might surprise a lot of people. We've been hurt by swimmers being sick or ineligible. If certain people come through, I think we can make a better run at it," said Scott Fraser.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

HUGH MAGINNIS

This week's Villanovan Athlete of the Week is ice hockey player Hugh Maginnis. Over the course of the season, the senior IceCat established himself as the school's all-time leading scorer. Maginnis also leads 'Nova with 19 goals and 23 assists in conference play and with 28 goals and 31 assists for 59 total points. Recently, in a Feb. 7 game against St. John's, Maginnis notched one goal and contributed two assists.

SPORTS SHORTS

Former golf coach Don Ficco dies

Don Ficco, a 1958 graduate of Villanova, died Feb. 10 after a protracted battle with kidney disease and diabetes. He coached the golf team from 1984 through 1990.

During his five years, Ficco led 'Nova to its first Big East golf championship in 1985 and accumulated numerous individual and team championships nationally. He stepped down as coach in 1989 but stayed with the program as an advisor.

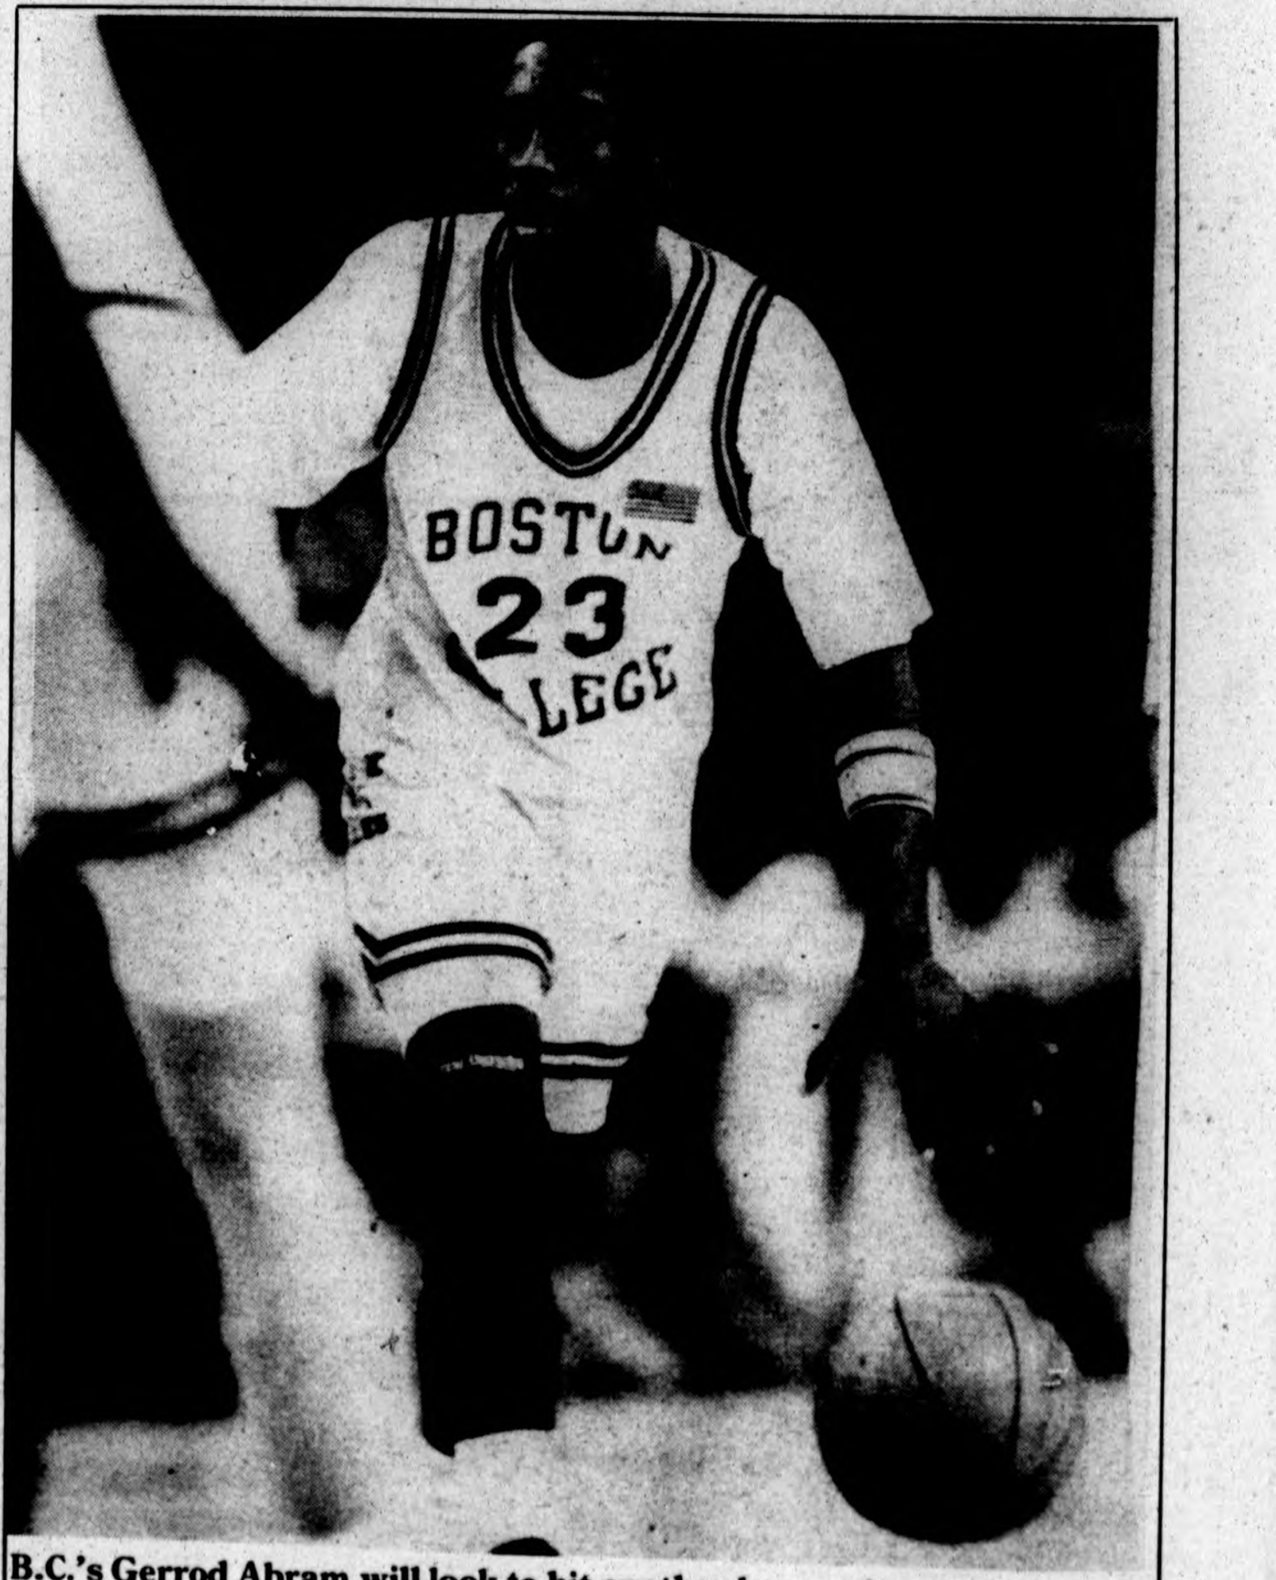
N.O.B. advanced to New Orleans

N.O.B., 'Nova's women's intramural football champions, captured the City Six championship in December with a 14-6 victory over LaSalle. This earned the team a trip to New Orleans over Christmas break to compete in the national tournament. The squad did not fare quite as well, finishing 1-2.

Flag football at 'Nova is a seven-on-seven, non-tackling sport. The seven girls who made the trek to New Orleans were captain Stacy Ronald, Carol Fasano, Kim Brickner, Anne Marie Tarnowski, Susan Repko, Kasey Keating and Janet Brown.

Doug West enters slam dunk contest

Former Villanova standout Doug West, a 1989 graduate, competed in the slam dunk contest over All-Star weekend in Orlando. The third-year Minnesota Timberwolf, who was picked by rap star Hammer to win the contest, was eliminated in the first round. However, the exposure given West will surely help his career. He has improved yearly since entering the NBA with the expansion Timberwolves in 1989. He averages 12 points per game this season.



B.C.'s Gerrod Abram will look to hit another buzzer-beater tomorrow night when the Cats visit B.C.

Benedix torches Pitt

By ED WASIELEWSKI
Assistant Sports Editor

The women's basketball team continued to improve as the Cats recently defeated Pittsburgh at duPont Pavilion Feb. 8. Despite suffering a loss on the road to Connecticut earlier in the week, 'Nova has raised its overall record to 8-13, 4-9 in conference action.

In their matchup against Pitt, the Cats used strong second-half shooting and high-scoring forward Nikki Benedix to roll past the Panthers, 66-54.

In a game marked by spurts, 'Nova seized its biggest lead of the first half, 18-6, nearly eight minutes into the contest. The Panthers stormed back and cut the 'Nova deficit to a single point at halftime, 27-26.

"Our offense is inconsistent," said Head Coach Harry Perretta. "We're working on being more consistent. In the second half, we played consistent. We shot around 60 percent and we scored enough to pull away."

The second half saw the Cats race off to another substantial lead. This time, however, Pitt could not overcome 'Nova's 59.3 percent shooting and Benedix's 14 second-half points.

"She was hot," said Perretta. "She was getting open and we did a nice job of getting her the ball."

The Cats shot nearly 50 percent for the game and held Pitt to a meager 36.4 percent from the floor. 'Nova outrebounded the Panthers 44-33.

Perretta said the key to the game was the defense. "We only scored 66 points," said Perretta. "But we were able to hold them to just 54 points. Our defense wins games for us."

Benedix poured in a game-high 31 points and contributed 13 rebounds. Junior Sheri Walker, in her second start of the season, responded with eight points.

Having already lost to the defending Big East champions earlier in the year, the Cats traveled to Storrs, Conn. seeking an upset Feb. 5. The Huskies had different plans and stung 'Nova early and often as the Cats managed only 11 first-half points on paltry 16.7 percent shooting. The Cats also committed 17 turnovers.

"We normally don't break down on defense," said Perretta. "We know that we'll struggle on offense, but when you combine them both, that's how you get down by that many points."

Trailing at halftime 49-11, the Cats rebounded in the second-half to play UConn even. Without the Huskies applying fullcourt pressure, 'Nova outscored UConn 38-37 as its offense got into the flow.

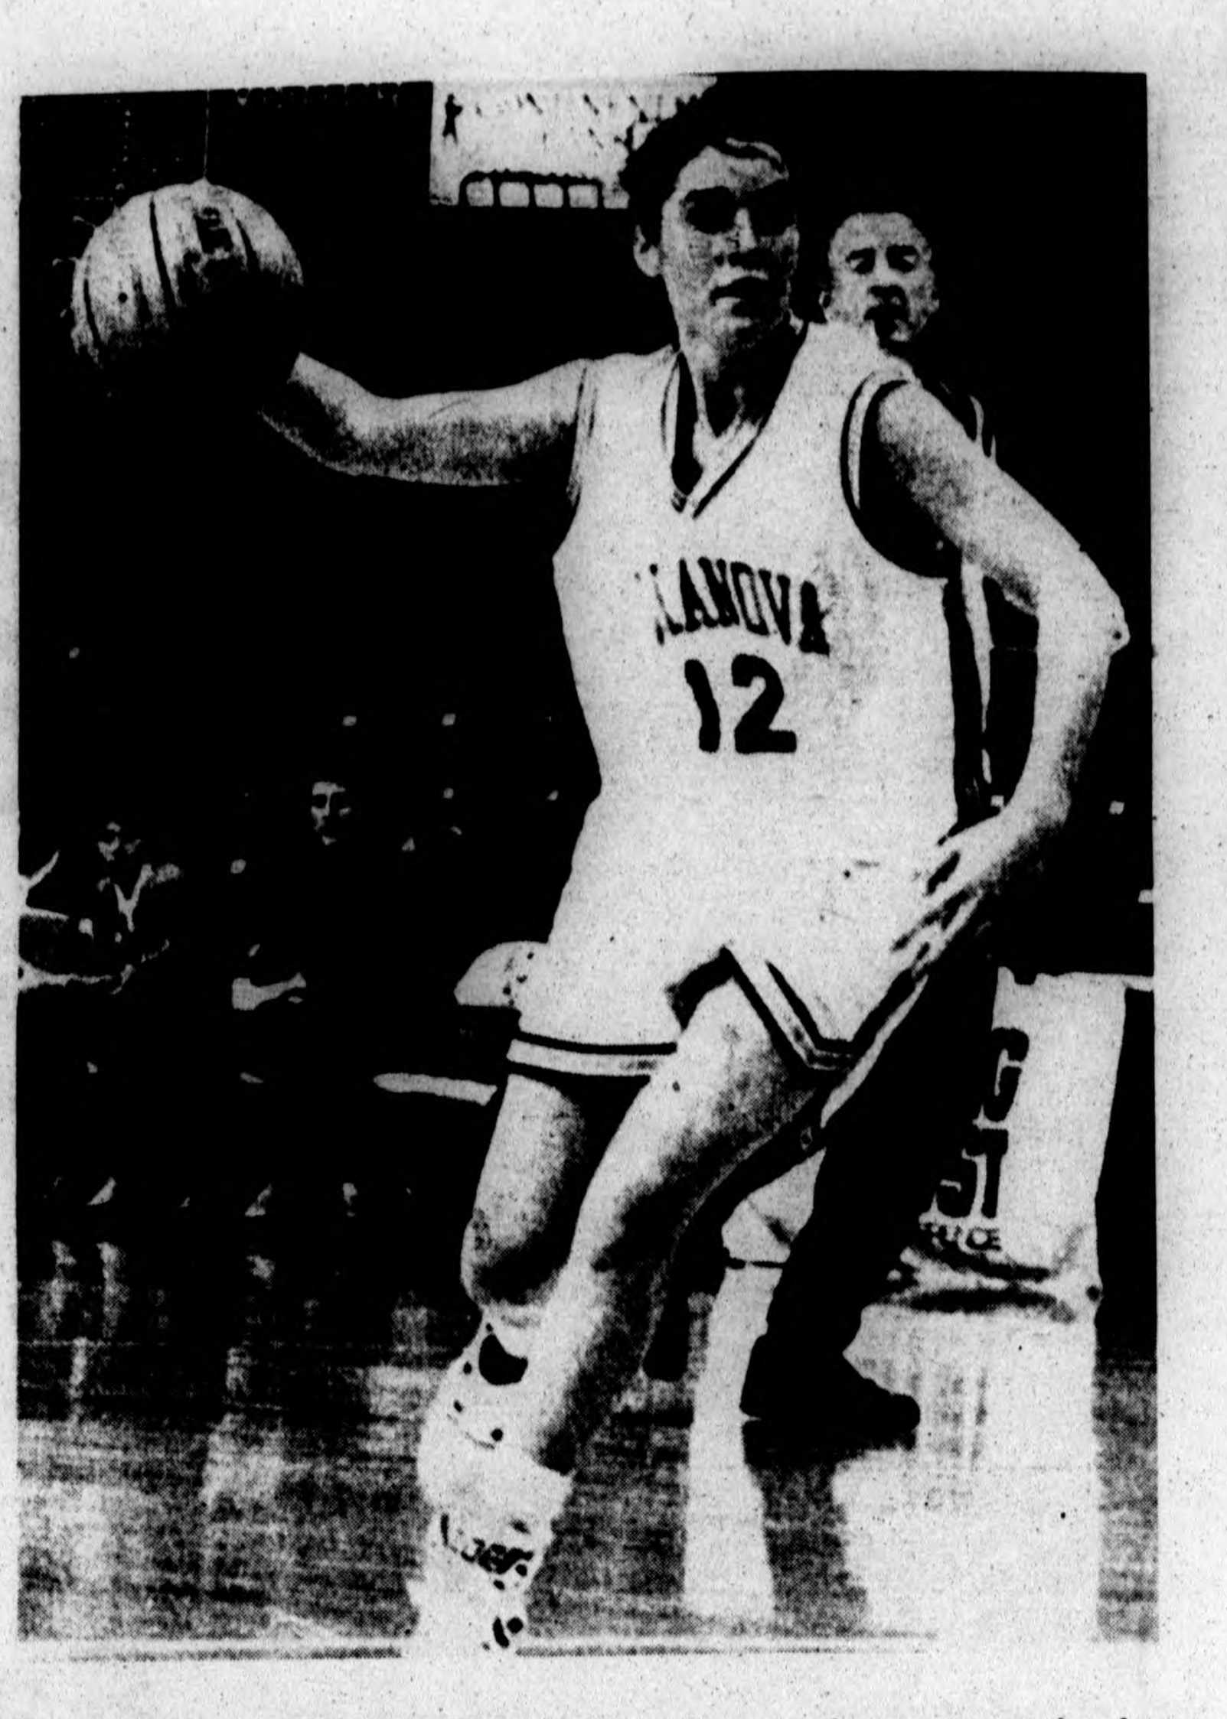
The Cats shot over 48 percent from the floor and received strong second-half performances from their two starting freshmen, Jen Maga and Michele Thornton. Nonetheless, the Cats could not overcome the Huskies' insurmountable lead, 86-49.

"The next day in practice," said Perretta, "we treated the game like it didn't happen."

Maga, with 17 points and seven rebounds, and Thornton, with 13 points, paced the Cats. Leading scorer Nikki Benedix (16.6 p.p.g.) was held to just two points on one for eight shooting from the field.

In their next Big East game, the Cats will play the Boston College Eagles tomorrow at 4 p.m.

NOTES: Freshman point guard Michele Thornton was named the Big East's Rookie of the Week for her efforts against UPenn and Syracuse. Thornton averaged 18.5 points and eight assists as she led the Cats to both wins. Also, two of 'Nova's incoming players for next season are local Delaware County products. Forward Denise Dillon and point guard Stacie Keffer attend Cardinal O'Hara High School in Springfield.



Freshman guard Michele Thornton has been a pleasant surprise for the surging Cats.

Maginnis leads Ice Cats

By RAY GUTOWSKI
Staff Reporter

The 'Nova ice hockey team suffered two defeats last week to Navy and ECAC-rival St. John's which eliminated the IceCats from playoff contention. 'Nova's record now stands at 6-15 overall, 4-11 in the ECAC.

The IceCats started their week with an away game in Jamaica, N.Y. Feb. 7. The host Redmen jumped to an early 3-1 lead in the opening period that 'Nova was unable to overcome. S.J.U. outscored the Cats 3-2 in the second period to give the Redmen an insurmountable 6-3 advantage.

The IceCats got two goals (19, 20) on the season and two assists (22, 23) from senior Marc Guertin. Guertin raised his season totals to 43 points. 'Nova also received goals from Jim Ready, Hugh Maginnis and Bill Fortescue.

Maginnis, who also added two assists, is the leading scorer on this year's squad with 59 total points and recently became the leading scorer in Villanova history. He will be honored Feb. 16 in a game against Scranton.

The IceCats met Navy at home and came away with a disappointing 6-3 loss Feb. 9. The Midshipmen managed to outscore the IceCats in each period 2-1. Junior Steve Flynn scored two goals and John Demers added a goal and two assists. Getting his first start in goal for 'Nova was Brian Ciampitti. The sophomore goaltender responded with 28 saves.

The IceCats have four remaining regular season matchups left before the conclusion of the 91-92 season.

NOTES: Hugh Maginnis not only leads the team in goals scored, but he leads the team in assists and total points. Guertin, with 43 points, and Dennis Mastriano, with 25 points, rank second and third on the team, respectively.

SYRACUSE
The 10th-ranked Orangemen remain atop the conference after having the weekend off. S.U. has an impressive 7-0 mark this season in games decided by seven points or less. Syracuse is currently second in the Big East in three-pointers per game and third in scoring. On Saturday, the Orangemen will host Notre Dame in a nationally televised contest.

CONNECTICUT
The Huskies' slide continued last week, as they dropped an 81-69 decision at home to Seton Hall. The loss was the Huskies' first at Gampel Pavilion since North Carolina State defeated them Feb. 16, 1991. Chris Smith scored 23 points and Rod Sellers added 17 points and a career-high 19 rebounds for Connecticut. Scott Burrell was held to just three points on one of 12 shooting. Forward Toraino Walker suffered a knee injury and is out indefinitely. UConn is now ranked 18th nationally.

PITTSBURGH
The Panthers went 2-1 last week, raising their conference marke to 7-4. Pitt began the week by trouncing host Miami 77-55, as Ahmad Shareef scored 20 points on eight of nine shooting and Sean Miller had eight assists. Pitt then traveled to Boston College and lost big, 79-59. The Panthers rebounded by registering a 77-68 victory over Villanova at home. Pitt began the game with a 10-0 run and never looked back. Eric Mobley led five Panthers in double figures with 15 points.

GEORGETOWN
The Hoyas started off the week with a 71-63 win over 'Nova. Alonzo Mourning scored 21 of his 26 points in the second half and G'town converted 33 of 37 free throws en route to victory. Georgetown followed this performance with an 86-63 home loss to Providence. The game marked the Hoyas' worst Big East loss ever. Mourning scored 18 points and grabbed 10 rebounds before being ejected in the second half.

ST. JOHN'S
The Redmen were a perfect 2-0 last week and moved to 7-5 in the conference. Shawnelle Scott scored a career-high 26 points and grabbed eight boards in a 70-60 win over B.C. The Johnnies then defeated Villanova 69-53. Senior star Malik Sealy led St. John's with 26 points and eight rebounds, while Chucky Sprolling and Scott contributed 13 and 12 points, respectively.

SETON HALL
The Hall went 2-0 last week, recording a pair of tough road wins. The 25th-ranked Pirates first defeated Providence 68-65 behind Terry Dehere's 20 points and Jerry Walker's 11 points and 11 rebounds. Seton Hall's road warriors then beat UConn 81-69 as Dehere pumped in 24 points and Walker deposited 22. The Pirates are 7-1 when they hold their opponents to under 40 percent from the field.

BOSTON COLLEGE
The Eagles buried Pitt 79-59, recording their largest margin of victory in conference play since 1985. Malcolm Huckaby led B.C. with 21 points and Howard Eisley added 20. Huckaby is now shooting 50 percent from three-point range. As a team, B.C. is leading the Big East in both field goal percentage (.462) and three-point shooting (.488).

PROVIDENCE
The Friars went 1-1 last week, dropping a tough 68-65 decision at home to Seton Hall before shocking Georgetown in Landover, Md. In the Seton Hall game, Michael Smith continued to play well, scoring 14 points and collecting 12 rebounds. P.C. clicked on all cylinders against G'town, blowing out the Hoyas 86-63. It was Providence's first win in 11 tries at the Capital Centre, Previously, the Friars had never beaten the Hoyas by more than four points in Big East play.

MIAMI
The Hurricanes played only once last week, losing 77-55 to Pitt. The Canes, however, are building for the future, as half of their offense comes from first-year players. Leading Miami's young guns are Ochiel Swaby (8.5 p.p.g.), Anthony Lawrence (7.1 p.p.g.) and 7-foot-2-inch center Contantin Popa (6.5 p.p.g.).

PLAYERS OF THE WEEK
Seton Hall forward Jerry Walker has been named the Big East Player of the Week. The 6-foot-7 junior averaged 16.5 points and 11 rebounds while leading the Pirates to a pair of road victories.

Providence forward Michael Smith claimed the Big East Rookie of the Week award for the third straight time. Smith had a pair of double-doubles, averaging 12.5 points and 12 rebounds. He leads the Friars in scoring (11.2 p.p.g.) and in rebounding (10.3 r.p.g.).

Women's Week in Review

By ALEX SCOFIELD
Staff Reporter

MIAMI
By the time last week had ended, the Hurricanes had inched up to the eighth spot in the national rankings and pulled further ahead of their Big East competitors. A pair of wins over Seton Hall and Georgetown extended their NCAA-leading winning streak to 20 games. With a 12-0 conference record, Miami is now three games ahead of their closest league adversaries, UConn and Providence. The Canes' Frances Savage appears headed towards the Big East Player of the Year title. She leads Miami in scoring (22 p.p.g.), rebounding (10.6 r.p.g.) and steals (48).

PROVIDENCE
For three weeks, the Lady Friars have been unable to break away from UConn in the conference standings. Both teams have notched five consecutive wins, good enough to land them in a tie for second place at 9-3. P.C. is now tops in the NCAA for scoring offense with an average of 93.7 points per game. In a thrillilng 89-88 win over Georgetown, team scoring leader Tracy Lis had 34 points, the third consecutive game in which she had scored that many Providence's other win was a 102-72 shellacking of the struggling Boston College Eagles.

GEORGETOWN
The Hoyas tumbled into fourth place in the league after their third consecutive loss. Although they played tough against the formidable squads of Providence and Miami, they found their record dropping to 8-4. In a 83-76 loss to the Hurricanes, G'town found a silver lining in the play of senior Karen Sheehan, who led the Hoyas on with 21 points and 11 rebounds. Another cause for Hoya cheer is that none of its remaining opponents have winning records.

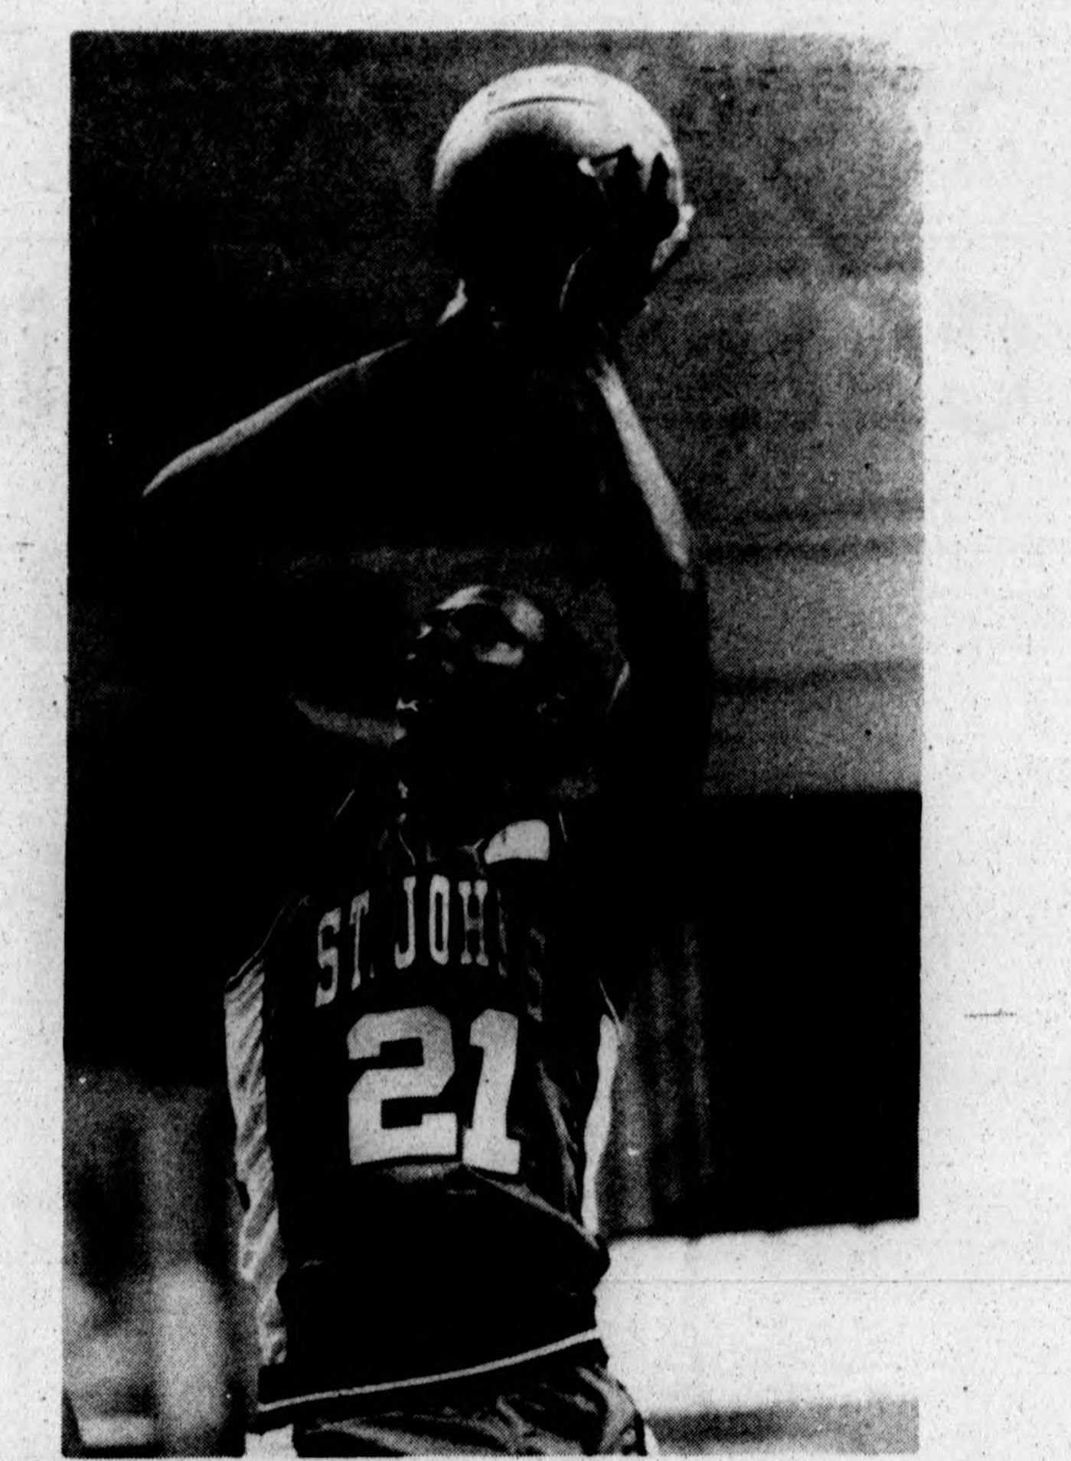
ST. JOHN'S
In a season in which Big East wins have been very unequally distributed, the Express is the only team with a record anywhere close to .500. St. John's began the week by narrowly beating Boston College 74-73. However, its loss to UConn dropped its Big East record to 5-7. Cozette Ballentine has been a consistent contributor all season long, and her 33 points against Boston College saved the Express from an 0-2 week.

SETON HALL
Slowly climbing out of the conference cellar, the Hall has gone 3-2 in its last five games. After being thrashed at the hands of Miami 68-46, the Lady Pirates redeemed themselves with a 71-52 win over Syracuse. The Hall has been steadily improving throughout the season and should not be taken lightly by its upcoming opponents.

CONNECTICUT
Freshman sensation Rebecca Lobo kept the Huskies in step with Providence after missing over two weeks with a wrist injury. Lobo made the most of her 15 minutes of playing time by scoring 10 points and snagging six rebounds in an 86-49 drubbing of Villanova. Her 15 points and four rebounds helped UConn overcome St. John's 60-55. Lobo's performance earned her the Big East Rookie of the Week title for a record fifth time this season.

PITTSBURGH
Fighting their way out of a four-game losing streak, the Lady Panthers ended their skid with a 58-53 win over Syracuse. Pitt went on to lose at Villanova 66-54 later in the week. Sophomore Jonna Huemrich inspired the team with a double-double (10 points, 13 rebounds) in their long-awaited win over Syracuse.

SYRACUSE
When the Eagles face Syracuse this week, one of the teams will emerge from the seven-game losing streak from which they are both suffering. Presently, B.C. holds a 2-10 record, last in the Big East.



St. John's star Malik Sealy goes up for the shot. The senior had 26 points in the team's 69-53 victory over 'Nova.

The Wildcats are completing the third of a three-game road trip with a game against the surprising Boston College Eagles. Villanova is a disappointing 8-12, 5-6 in Big East play. The Cats are struggling for much-needed wins to enhance their chances of postseason play. Following the Boston College game, the Wildcats return home to face the newest Big East member the Miami Hurricanes.

After losing 19 straight Big East conference games the past two years, Coach Jim O'Brien's Eagles have turned things around. The Eagles are 5-2 in their last seven Big East outings. B.C. started out 8-1 in nonleague play, and now stand at 13-7. The Eagles have the NCAA's on their minds for the first time since 1985 — Villanova's championship season.

The B.C. attack is anchored by sophomore center Billy Curley. Curley, the most heralded player to wear the maroon and gold since Dana Barros, is averaging over 16 points and eight rebounds a game this season. Curley is complimented by a three-guard attack led by Malcolm Huckaby (15.3 p.p.g.), Howard Eisley (9 p.p.g.) and Gerrod Abram. Abram has been a three-time buzzer-beater for the Eagles, singlehandedly winning consecutive games against Providence, Seton Hall and Miami. B.C. returns four starters, all sophomores from last year's club, and their experience has paid off well as a balanced scoring attack has helped present a formidable lineup. Villanova won the teams' first meeting of the year Jan. 8 by a score of 83-74. The game at duPont was close at the half until a second half Wildcat run sealed the game. The Cats controlled the boards by holding the undersized Eagles to single shots on offense. For the Cats to come up with a much-needed sweep of B.C., they must again control the glass as well as create good shot opportunities on offense.

Miami is led by junior guard Jake Morton. Other key contributers are senior Jerome Scott and juniors Trevor Burton and Samarr Logan. Four freshmen have been cast into Big East play early in their careers. Leading the class is Ochiel Swaby, a forward who averaged 47 points per game as a senior in high school. Other freshmen to watch include Constantin Popa, Pat Lawrence, and point guard Michael Gardner. Confidence is the name of the game Tuesday night. The Cats need to regain their composure and get ready for the stretch run. They must regain the confidence that took them to the second round of the NCAA's in 1990-1991. Miami is a young, inexperienced bunch of Big East performers. For the Cats to pick up a win against the Hurricanes, they must not let Miami gain any bit of confidence that propelled it to its victory against St. John's. The game is, without a doubt, a must-win.

Cats drop third straight, now 8-12

Time is running out for the Villanova Wildcats.

After starting 5-1 in the Big East, the Cats have dropped a school record five consecutive league games, putting their conference mark at 5-6, good for a seventh-place tie with tomorrow's opponent Boston College. Even worse, their overall record is 8-12.

The most recent setback occurred Feb. 10 at Pittsburgh. The Cats, much like their opening against Georgetown Feb. 4 when they fell behind 20-4, opened the game in a 17-4 hole. This against a Pitt team that has not yet lost at home.

But, as in the G'town game, the Cats made a furious first-half rally that cut the lead to two at the half, 31-29. 'Nova had a chance to tie the game with four seconds left, but a turnover put an end to those plans.

The Cats could never pull even with the Panthers in the second half. Both Chris Walker and James Bryson missed the front end of two one-on-ones, leaving Pitt ahead by five points. Bryson, however, kept the game close with 14 points and nine rebounds.

The real matchup, though, was Miller vs. Miller. That is, Pitt's senior point guard Sean Miller and 'Nova's all-around best player Lance Miller. Pitt's Miller was magnificent throughout the game. The team's leader, Miller played 39 minutes of intense basketball, continuously picking apart 'Nova's defense by hitting Pitt's big men for easy baskets. He also made all six free throws down the stretch to secure the win in addition to dishing out nine assists.

> I can't really be happy. This shouldn't be happening to us.
> 'Nova guard Lance Miller

Not to be outdone, Lance Miller singlehandedly almost brought the Cats back in the second half. The guard scored a game-high 21 points, hitting all six free throws and an off-balance three-pointer late in the game. But by then the game was out of reach.

"I can't really be happy," said 'Nova's Miller. "This shouldn't be happening to us."

Part of the problem, according to Pitt's Head Coach Paul Evans, who had similar problems last year with a veteran squad, is confidence. The Cats are just not shooting the ball well, which is nothing new. But what really has hurt the team as of late has been free-throw shooting. The team was just 17 of 29 from the stripe against Pitt. Combine this with 36 percent shooting and the Cats were lucky to lose by just nine.

So where do the Cats go from here? If there is a silver lining, it is the fact that this team plays in streaks. There is a good possibility that 'Nova can turn it around again, like it did when it started 0-3 and 2-6. They have a team comprised of juniors and seniors who know what it takes to get it done at the end. The past two years are a good example. The Cats played tremendously well down the stretch to claw into the NCAA's both years.

The schedule should work in 'Nova's favor. They still have Miami twice and home games against Providence, Pitt and Seton Hall. But the time to turn it around is now, starting tomorrow night at Boston College.

NOTES: Last year at this time, Villanova was 11-9, 4-5 in the Big East ... After 20 games, Miller is the team's leading scorer at 15.3 points per game. Rebounding leader Bryson is pulling down six rebounds per game ... The Cats have won their last six meetings against the Eagles and hold a 38-10 series advantage.

Women capture Millrose

By MIKE AGOLINO
Staff Reporter

The Villanova women's track and field team continues to enjoy success and is looking toward another strong showing in the upcoming NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships.

The team traveled to Madison Square Garden in New York to compete in the prestigious 1992 Snickers Millrose Games Feb. 6-8. The Cats captured first place in the only event in which they competed, the 4x800 meter relay.

Junior Irene Ruopoli started things off for Villanova by running a 2:13.6 leg, which left the Cats tied for the lead with the Westchester (NY) Track Club. Running the second leg for the Wildcats was junior Chris Gentile, who turned in the squad's fastest time at 2:10.4. In spite of the solid performances by Ruopoli and Gentile, Villanova was still even with Westchester after the second leg.

The third leg was the turning point for the Cats, when junior Cheri Goddard took the baton and broke the race wide open. Her time of 2:13.2 opened up almost a half-lap lead for Villanova. That opened the door for anchor Nnenna Lynch, who had no problem sealing first place with a solid time of 2:15.3. Villanova's overall winning time was 8:51.58, easily outdistancing second-place Westchester Track Club, who finished in 9:01.90.

Head Coach Marty Stern thought that it was fitting that all four members of Villanova's relay team hail from New York.

"One of the goals of every woman at Villanova is to run on a winning 4x800 relay team at the Millrose Games," said Stern. "One of the goals of every kid that grows up in New York is winning a race at Madison Square Garden in front of their family and friends. What a thrill it must have been for those four New York girls."

This weekend, the team will travel to Iowa State University in Ames, Iowa for the Iowa State Track Classic.

Gariba takes third

Courtesy of Sports Information

The men's track team competed this past weekend at the Snickers Millrose Games in New York's Madison Square Garden. The team was entered in just two events but performed well in both, as the 3200-meter relay team finished second and sprinter Salaam Gariba placed third in the 60-meter dash.

In the first event for the Wildcats, Gariba easily won the first of two heats in the 60-meter dash with a time of 6.65 seconds. However, two runners in the second heat registered faster times than Gariba, as Andre Carson of the Goldwin Track Club (6.52 seconds) and former 100-meter world-record holder Leroy Burrell of the Santa Monica Track Club (6.55 seconds) eclipsed Gariba's pace. Carson currently holds the world record in the 60-meter dash.

"Salaam proved once again that he is one of the best sprinters in America and the world," said Head Coach Marty Stern of Gariba, who made the semi-finals of the World Championships last August in the 100-meter dash. "He won the college division race convincingly, and he and I are looking forward to the IC4A's, NCAA's, and Barcelona [Olympics]."

> Salaam proved once again that he is one of the best sprinters in America and the world.
> Head Coach Marty Stern

The 3200-meter relay squad ran against a strong field and finished second to the New York Athletic Club (NYAC), which included former Olympian and Villanovan John Marshall. Sophomore Mike Going led off and handed the baton to freshman Louie Quintant in second place behind NYAC, where they would remain for the rest of the race. Quintana turned in an impressive 1:51.8 split. Finn Kelly and Brad Sumner both ran fine legs (1:50.9 and 1;51.7, respectively) but were unable to pass NYAC, who won by less than a second.

"I congratulate the men on defeating all of the colleges, and for the second year in a row finishing second at the Millrose Games," said Stern. "We are looking forward to this weekend at Iowa State."

Villanova will travel to Ames, Iowa this weekend for the Iowa State Track Classic.

THE POINT AFTER

Big East $eeks more than just academics

KFC is the official fast food of the Big East.

By TOM COLLINS
Editor in Chief

The hypocrisy and greed of college athletics, particularly men's basketball, reached an all-time low recently with Dick Vitale doing his usual act of self-indulgence and uncontrollable excitement in an advertisement proclaiming the sponsorship of "Kentucky Fried Chicken as the official fast food restaurant of the Big East."

Are you kidding me, Dick? Are you serious? I've seen it all, fans. I've seen it all.

Both Vitale and the Big East Conference should either admit to the fact college athletics is indeed professional and pay the athletes or stop this rampant exploitation. Heck, maybe Pepsi can become the official soda of the Villanova Wildcats: "Money ... Gotta Have It."

The Big East has continually portrayed itself as an allegiance of top schools who stand for what is right in college athletics: "We graduate players who act in a class manner both on and off the court and while doing so remain one of the most competitive conferences in the nation." Indeed, the conference is composed of such high-profile academic institutions as Georgetown, Boston College, 'Nova and Providence. But do not kid yourself, the conference has one bottom line, and it's not graduation rate. It's money.

The Big East has its own television network, appears twice a week on ESPN, has a contract with CBS and makes millions in revenue from NCAA Tournament success. Why do you think Miami joined the conference? To improve its basketball program? Partially. To make more money? Definitely.

The unfortunate side of this rampant greed is the continual exploitation of the athlete. School administrators say, "We give athletes a free education (equivalent to $80,000, by the way!) and all they have to do is lace up a pair of sneakers (that the coaches get paid for) and play the game they love."

That looks like a good deal until you consider that the only reason that "KFC is the official fast food of the Big East" is because Alonzo Mourning, Chris Smith and Terry Dehere dunk and shoot the ball better than most. Without the athlete, there would be no TV contract or tournament success.

But to pay a student-athlete would be hypocritical? Who is the NCAA kidding? To utilize

Student attitudes polled

Most students do not know what an alcoholic is, according to a random campus-wide poll administered by the Villanovan.

One hundred and twenty-six students were asked 10 yes- or no-questions concerning the use and abuse of alcoholic beverages. Respondents were selected randomly and represented all colleges at the University. The poll also contained two open-ended questions where students were asked to define binge drinking and the term alcoholic.

One student did not think that an alcoholic could really exist, according to the results of the poll. "I think anyone can stop [drinking] at anytime, so I don't believe there is such a thing" as an alcoholic, responded the senior commerce and finance student.

A common response among students was that an alcoholic was someone addicted to alcohol. "An alcoholic is one who feels compelled to drink, whether he or

Although the legal drinking age in Pennsylvania is 21, many underage students regularly abuse alcohol, the number one drug of choice on college campuses.

Alcohol-related incidents doubled last year's total

By LARISA EPATKO
News Editor

The University Department of Public Safety reported over 300 alcohol-related incidents occurring at the University during the 1991-1992 academic year. This amount more than doubled last year's total of 130.

Fewer students on campus have been apprehended by Public Safety for violating the University alcohol Code of Student Conduct, said James Conway, investigator for Public Safety.

The Center for Drug and Alcohol Assistance serves University students in the areas of education, prevention and intervention. The center provides diagnostic evaluations, support groups, a peer assistance program and an addiction resource library.

Janice M. Janosik and Lynne Hincken, certified addictions counselors, and Tara Penza staff the center. They provide students with confidential individual and group counseling.

Pennsylvania law states that a person less than 21 years of age commits a summary offense if he or she attempts to purchase, purchases, consumes, possesses or transports any alcohol, liquor or malt or brewed beverages.

People who drink underage will lose their driver's license for 90 days and will receive a fine for $300.

"The University reserves the right to sanction students who violate the State Code," according to the 1991-1992 Student Handbook.

Students 21 years and older are allowed to possess and consume moderate amounts of alcoholic beverages in residence hall rooms or designated areas in other University facilities. Beer kegs and beer balls are not permitted on campus without authorization.

The code also states that students convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol will be liable to University suspension.

"I'm hoping that most of them [the students] have the common sense to not get in a car after they have been drinking," said Tracy Hentz, investigator for Public Safety.

> I'm hoping that most [students] have the common sense to not get in a car after they have been drinking.

Alcohol in an alcoholic beverage reaches the brain almost immediately after the drink is consumed, according to Conway. The results may include poor judgment, loss of concentration, slowed reaction time and visual problems, he said.

Once a person stops drinking, alcohol effects wear off at a fairly constant rate of about .015 percent blood alcohol content (B.A.C.) per hour, Conway said.

If a person 150-180 pounds drinks five beers in one hour, the person will attain a B.A.C. of .10 percent, said Conway, adding that it would take almost three hours for the person's B.A.C. to become less than .06 percent.

"We're not here to ruin their [the students'] fun," said David Mann, investigator for Public Safety. "But alcohol is involved in so many sexual assaults ... it's a prime factor," he said.

Students' attitudes reflect drinking myths

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

Alcohol continues as the No. 1 drug of choice on college campuses in the United States, according to the final report prepared by the National Commission on Drug Free Schools in 1990.

A 1990 research study entitled "Drug Use, Drinking, and Smoking: National Survey Results in High School, College and Young Populations," conducted by L.D. Johnston, P.M. O'Malley and J.G. Blackman, revealed that 94 percent of college students used alcohol, 76 percent used alcohol within the previous month and 42 percent had five or more drinks in a row within the previous two weeks.

Many young people using drugs and alcohol today are unaware of the real dangers associated with their use, said the President of Rainbow Productions Carmen F. Ambrosino in a pamphlet entitled "A Student Handbook on Drug and Alcohol Abuse." "Many times we rationalize our use of them and minimize the effects they are having on our lives," said Ambrosino.

Young people use and abuse alcohol for a number of reasons, Ambrosino said. His handbook outlines 13 of the most frequent reasons why young adults use alcohol and drugs. A poor self-concept is one common reason why young adults choose to use alcohol and drugs, he said.

Depression and not being able to cope with the daily psychological stress of life contribute to young adults' use of drugs and alcohol also, Ambrosino added.

Feeling like a failure and feeling "average" are common images many young people have of themselves, said Ambrosino. Such attitudes are common reasons why young adults use alcohol and drugs, he said.

Family problems, loneliness and boredom can be attributed to the large numbers of students who use drugs and alcohol, Ambrosino said. Peer pressure and an attitude of "everybody is doing it but me" also account for the large percentages of students who use drugs and alcohol, he added.

Students who feel they cannot live up to the standards imposed on them by authority and who feel they are disappointments to others often use drugs and alcohol, said Ambrosino. The search for personal identity and a rebellious attitude against the norms of society contribute to the high numbers of students who use drugs and alcohol, he added.

> Many times we rationalize our use of them [alcohol and drugs] and minimize the effects they are having on our lives.
> Carmen F. Ambrosino, president of Rainbow Productions

The search for immediate gratification and for sexual enhancement prompt many students to use and abuse drugs and alcohol, said Ambrosino. Indefinable fears also prompt students to use, he said.

"Attempting to solve your problems with drugs and alcohol is not the answer. Instead, the problems become more complex, thus overwhelming you," said Ambrosino.

The belief that users do not have any major problems with alcohol because of infrequent usage is a drinking myth, he said. To use drugs and alcohol because it is the thing to do nowadays is another misconception, he said.

"Anyone who uses drugs or alcohol increases their chances of problems; the longer we use, the more compounded the problems may become. Amount of drugs and alcohol taken is not the key, what happens to our behavior, attitude, personality and actions is what counts," Ambrosino added.

On campus socializing found difficult without the use of alcohol

By ELIZABETH BARSZCZEWSKI
Assistant News Editor

Many students believe that alcohol consumption is an integral part of social events on and around campus, said Gary Bonas, associate director of Student Activities. Many students associate social events and enjoying themselves strictly with drinking and intoxication, he said.

"It is a pretty major problem in that it seems to me that Villanova students have difficulty in socializing without the use of alcohol," said Bonas.

Maybe as a result of the "I'm Free for the Weekend" programs being held this weekend, students will realize that they do not need alcohol to have fun, Bonas said.

A big question still remains as to what role the University can play in helping to alleviate the abuse of alcohol by students. Villanova needs to provide as many activities as possible that students can involve themselves in which do not involve the use of alcohol, said Bonas.

> Over the years it has become very clear that the consistent drug of choice is alcohol.

There is some difficulty in doing this because students refuse to go to alcohol-free activities, he added. The programs may turn out to be financial failures or demoralizing when many students put a great deal of work into putting programs together and no one attends, Bonas said.

Social drinking may often turn into a serious problem with alcohol which can affect a student's grades, relationships with peers and one's entire future, said the Rev. John Stack, O.S.A., dean of Students.

"Over the years it has become very clear that the constant drug of choice is alcohol," said Stack.

"In almost every disciplinary case I have encountered over the years, alcohol has been involved," said Stack. "There has never been a case that has come to my attention concerning date rape,, assault or vandalism where alcohol was not involved," he added.

In addition, alcohol has affected people's grades, ability to attend class and their academic standing, Stack said. The abuse of alcohol in many ways keeps students from reaching their potential, he said.

"What the University would like to do is encourage responsible drinking, but we cannot foster that since three-fourths of our students are underage," Stack said.

Benjamin L. Hooks, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), recently announced that he will retire from his position at the end of the year.

The 15-year veteran of the NAACP disclosed his decision at a meeting of the NAACP's national board of directors.

Hooks took over as executive director of the nation's oldest civil rights organization in 1977, succeeding Roy Wilkins. In his statement, he spoke of the satisfaction the last several years have given him and that he planned a news conference in Washington for this week.

Two Libyans accused of the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am jet will face charges at an unprecedented hearing this week, a Libyan official said. The official, part of the Libyan Information Ministry, announced that reporters will be allowed to attend the meeting.

The men, Abdel Baset Ali Mohamed al-Meghrahi and Al-Amin Khalifa Fhimah, had been under house arrest since November and their attorney was looking to speed up the process for fear of their lives.

The United States and Britain allege the men were members of the Libyan intelligence service and were involved in the bombing of the Pan Am airliner over the town of Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed 270 people.

A jury found that although he murdered, dismembered and ate body parts of 15 people, Jeffrey Dahmer was sane when he committed these acts.

Because Dahmer pleaded guilty to the 15 counts of murder and since Wisconsin has no death penalty, he was sentenced to life imprisonment for each of the counts. In a hearing scheduled, a judge will decide whether Dahmer will ever be eligible for parole, but it is unlikely that he will.

Dahmer will be placed in the Columbia Correctional Institution in Wisconsin in solitary confinement.

Former heavyweight boxing champion Mike Tyson was found guilty Feb. 10 for raping a Miss Black America contestant last July at the Canterbury Hotel in Indianapolis. These charges were one count of rape and two counts of criminal deviant conduct.

Combining these three charges, Tyson faces a maximum sentence of 60 years in jail. His sentencing hearing is March 6 with Judge Patricia Gifford.

Afer the trial came to a conclusion, the plaintiff made her identity public. She is 18-year-old Desiree Washington, a freshman at Providence College in Rhode Island.

HENNING, Tenn.

Alex Haley, renowned for his novel Roots: The Saga of an American Family, died of a heart attack at age 70.

The funeral and burial took place in Henning, Tenn., the small town in which he was raised by his grandmother. Among those present were the Rev. Jesse Jackson and Secretary of Education Lamar Alexander.

Haley achieved international fame and a Pulitzer Prize in 1977 for Roots, which traced back his family tree six generations to Kunta Kinte, a West African slave. The novel sparked an interest in genealogy. An ABC mini-series was created from Haley's work, attracting 130 million viewers.

Commander Cecilia Brown of the United States Navy spoke about women in the Navy and her own experiences as a Naval officer.

Lecture focuses on role of women in U.S. Navy

By JIM DOWNS
Staff Reporter

Commander Cecilia Brown of the U.S. Navy presented a lecture entitled "Women In The Navy" Feb. 13 in the Center for Peace and Justice. In her speech she spoke about her own career as a naval officer and the role that women play in the Navy.

Brown, a veteran of 24 years, was raised in California and attended the University of California Santa Barbara where she received a bachelor's degree in analytic biology and physical education.

Her first tour of duty placed her in a classified unit in Washington, D.C. She was then promoted to an administrative position in personnel exchange in England. From there Brown worked as a recruiter in various schools for the Navy. Her job brought her back to Washington, D.C., where she served as an advisor to Congress.

Brown went back to school and earned her master's degree from San Diego State. She was promoted to executive officer after returning to the Navy. Brown was the first woman to become an executive officer in the Navy. She presently works as a recruiter at Villanova and the University of Pennsylvania.

Women began service in the Navy as early as 1917. The women were in supporting roles, clerical, enlisted and administrative positions, Brown said.

Women served in World War II. They acted as a reserve component to augment the regular active duty. They were labeled with the acronym WAVES (Women Accepted for Voluntary Service).

In 1948 women became common in the active force. During World War II, 12,500 women served in the Navy. The Navy believed that the work of three women equated the work of two men, Brown said. It was not until the 1970s that women were truly liberated in the Navy.

In 1972 women were eligible to apply to NROTC. Two years later women first became aviators. In 1975 women who were pregnant were able to stay in the Navy.

In 1976 women were admitted to the Naval Academy. Women were able to be on the ships in 1978. In the 1980s women were accepted to diving school and were promoted to be flight officers.

Also, in the 1980s, the Defense Act allowed women to be promoted to higher positions. Prior to this legislation, women were only able to rank as high as lieutenant commander. Finally, in December 1991, women were allowed to fight in combat missions.

Brown said there was a problem in the Navy with distinguishing combat and non-combat duty. She said combat was defined when women were flying at 30,000 feet in a mission, because they were in danger.

A problem that women face in the Navy is male acceptance, Brown said. There is a fear that men will protect females and risk the lives of other men, she said.

"I look at myself as a person and make this organization go," she said.

Another problem that women face in the Navy is whether or not they are capable enough to handle the physical and psychological torment of war. "If women cannot do it, I believe men cannot do it," Brown said.

Brown said that, in order for doors to be open for women, there must be some things accomplished. First, people must realize women are equal, Brown said. Second, soldiers should be raised in the right male/female climate. Thirdly, non-traditional positions must be filled.

University Senate meets today

By JILL CALLAHAN
Staff Reporter

The University Senate will hold a meeting today to discuss installing phones in the residence halls and lowering the price of season basketball tickets.

The Executive Committee meets two weeks prior to every Senate meeting to decide on the main issues that require discussion.

Donald Hoover, director of telecommunications, is coming to speak on the status of phones in the residence halls and the issue of an emergency phone system which may be installed next year.

The second motion will attempt to lower the price of season basketball tickets for next year. Senators will compare the prices of season tickets at the University to other Big East schools.

The Senate also will discuss the effectiveness of the Spectrum tickets in the season-ticket package.

No one is expected to oppose any of the motions, said Student Government President Mark O'Rourke. "This shouldn't be a controversial meeting. The Executive Committee supports the motions being presented," he said.

The Senate will hold the meeting in the East Lounge of Dougherty Hall at 4 p.m.

The next Senate meeting is the budget meeting, scheduled at a later date.

Seasonal changes affect disposition

By JANET KEMPLE
Staff Reporter

Dr. Steven Krauss of the department of psychology discussed winter depression at a lecture delivered Feb. 13 in Tolentine Hall.

This type of depression, officially known as Seasonal Affective Disorder, afflicts large numbers of college students and is especially prevalent during the months of January and February.

Seasonal affective disorder is caused by a lack of bright sunlight, characteristic of the winter months, when patients are at their worst psychological state, said Krauss.

The disorder includes "bipolar dimensions," deep depression during the winter. The depression gives way to an almost abnormal level of happiness throughout the summer months.

While many people experience depression for non-seasonal reasons, symptoms differ for victims of Seasonal Affective Disorder, Krauss said.

Winter depressives feel an increased need for sleep, as well as an increased appetite, Krauss said. They may experience an "absence of thinking," dulled senses and thought processes, blank facial expressions and slowed speech. These people may be temporarily unable to experience pleasure, constantly feeling worthless and pessimistic, he added.

A survey of college students in Minnesota provided new information on the nature of this disorder and its treatment. Krauss assisted in this survey.

"Only about 4 percent of individuals don't experience much seasonal variation at all. One percent experience a reverse variation, in which winter becomes their best season, and summer their worst," Krauss said.

The typical victim of full-fledged winter depression is a woman in her 20s or 30s, but anyone can be affected, he said.

The treatment for Seasonal Affective Disorder is exposure to artificial daylight, said Krauss. Patients sit about two feet away from specially-designed fluorescent lights of a prescribed intensity for four hours a day. A relationship between intensity and time was established, leading to fewer necessary treatment hours under brighter lights.

The results of the Minnesota study were dramatic, Krauss said. Sufferers of winter depression were interviewed, treated with artificial daylight and interviewed again.

"After two weeks of bright light exposure, their level of depression dramatically dropped," said Krauss.

Dr. Steven Krauss discussed winter depression at a lecture on Feb. 13 in Tolentine Hall.

Nova's Olympic hopefuls prepare for summer games

By TANYA C. RUSYNKO
Staff Reporter

Several University athletes are preparing for the 1992 Summer Olympic trials. Members of both the track and swimming teams will try out for the U.S. team, and a few athletes will represent foreign countries.

Track coach Marty Stern said, "They're [the track runners] working very hard. It's the goal of everyone on our team to make it to the Olympics. They all have a good chance."

Villanova also has several freshmen who have a chance to qualify, but have not had the opportunity yet, said Stern.

Villanova track team members who will be going to the trials are Terrence Mahon, Brad Sumner, Nnenna Lynch, Cheri Goddard, Finn Kelly, Carole Zajac and Kate Fonshell.

Sonia O'Sullivan has already made Ireland's team and will be representing her country in Barcelona, Spain, this summer. Also, Salaam Gariba will be running for his country, Ghana, in West Africa.

David Cook plans to represent Canada in the decathlon if he is successful at the trials.

Approximately 13 Villanova alumna will be participating in the United States' trials.

O'Sullivan, who is from the town of Cobh in County Cork, Ireland, has been running since she was 15. She has aspired to be like other prominent Olympic runners from Ireland who attended Villanova.

"I always knew that ... someday I would make it there," said O'Sullivan.

Cook has been preparing for the decathlon trials for a year and a half after being inspired by a former Villanova track coach. He must meet a standard score and is confident that he will be successful.

"I'm really psyched. I think I'll be No. 2 [out of three selected] in Canada ... I'm really hooked on it," said Cook. "If I can have a really good day, I know I can do it," he added.

Gariba, a junior, will be in the 100-meter race at Barcelona. He has been running since 1985 and participated in the last Olympaid in 1988, but did not place because of his youth and inexperience. He also ran at the World Games in Japan last year and was ranked as one of the 16 fastest men in the world.

"This is the time. I'm getting myself together with a lot of confidence. It will be different this time," said Gariba.

Gariba, who trains approximately 20 hours a week, said, "I just feel it. Something is coming for me. I don't know what it is yet, but with the type of training and the type of determination I have, it will be different.

"I'm proud to be a Villanovan. I'd like to thank all of Villanova for supporting me ... and making my stay here a happy one," said Gariba.

The U.S. track team trials will be held in New Orleans, LA. June 19-28. Stern said, "When you go to the Olympics, it's like a Villanova reunion. That's one of the things our program is known for. Since '48, 'Nova has had a track athlete in every Olympiad."

Two members of the swim team will also be going to the trials this spring. Mary Dowling will be trying out for the U.S. team in March, and Lisa Flood will be trying out for Canada's team in May. Swim team coach Chuck Horton said others may qualify for the trials as well.

Horton said the swimmers must meet the qualifying times established by each country.

"They're hard-working and it's because of their dedication and desire that they've made it this far. ... Every athlete would like to go to the Olympics. It's the pinnacle of your [their] swimming career," Horton said.

Dowling, who has been swimming since she was 8 years old, will be trying out for the mile freestyle.

"I'll be swimming with a lot of people who've been my heroes," said Dowling.

She feels prepared, but says, "It all comes down to how you feel on a certain day."

Reporters subpoenaed in Thomas-Hill case

By College Press Service

A special Senate counsel has subpoenaed two reporters who broke the story of University of Oklahoma law professor Anita Hill's sexual harassment allegations against Clarence Thomas.

Attorneys for Timothy Phelps of Newsday and Nina Totenberg of National Public Radio (NPR) say that the two journalists will not reveal the sources of their stories to the Senate's special counsel, Peter E. Fleming Jr.

Fleming has subpoenaed the two reporters along with any copies of FBI statements from Hill, tape recordings of interviews and telephone toll records in their possession. The subpoena also requested tape recordings and notes of conversations with Sen. Paul Simon (D.-Ill), a Judiciary Committee member quoted in the Newsday story.

Lawyers for both NPR and Newsday say that the subpoenas tread on the First Amendment protections of a journalist's right to protect confidential sources and gather news.

New toy simulates effects of LSD use

By College Press Service

Kelly Green's business is hallucination.

It started 12 years ago, when the self-proclaimed Colorado ski bum was tripping on LSD. He walked by a library and decided to research the drug.

"Then I went back when I was straight," Green said. The information he gathered there, along with a gadget he discovered while on a boat on Lake Powell in Utah, resulted in the Kaleido-Sky, a plastic toy for adults.

The Kaleido-Sky, also called the Day-Dreamer, or the LSD Flight Simulator, produces one of the effects of LSD without having to take the drug.

The toy generates "squiggles when you close your eyes," Green said, along with a vivid array of changing colors.

The toy that Green came across at Lake Powell was a sort of metal plate with a blade on it, a primitive version of his LSD flight simulator. Green said the device was so unusual and entertaining to him and his friends, who fought over the toy for three days, that he figured it had some serious potential.

"In my laughter, I was thinking, this thing must be illegal," he said.

It was not, and he managed to locate the patentholder, a former student at the University of Colorado in Boulder, a hippie who had moved to California and was living in a tent. The inventor explained to Green that the device started as a college project, then sold him the rights to the patent.

Green simplified the device and eventually began selling them across the country, primarily to college students.

"I sell a lot in college towns and at Grateful Dead concerts," he said.

The toy is simple to use — you place it over your eyes, blow into a small tube that powers an inner disk, which spins and causes the flickering of sunlight through eyeholes cut in the toy's mold. Those flashes of light striking the closed eye produce the visual designs and bright colors.

Green expects the sale of his toy to pick up now that LSD has become a more popular drug among the college crowd.

"I'm not trying to condone the use of LSD, I'm just trying to simulate the effects of the drug," he said.

Campus security increased at Jacksonville State

By College Press Service

Officials have tightened dormitory security at Jacksonville State University (JSU) after a semester of violence culminated in an on-campus murder.

Two days before the end of the fall semester, a man was shot to death in a dorm room while visiting a student. Another visitor has been charged in connection with the murder.

In November, three people were injured when a student fired a gun into a crowd outside a dorm.

The previous month, two students were arrested after a student claimed she was raped in a male residence hall. In September, a residence hall visitor fired several random shots from a nine-millimeter weapon.

To prevent future incidents, campus police have adopted stronger security measures. JSU hired three additional officers, two of whom will serve as night-time, armed patrol officers. Unarmed security monitors also are in all dorms.

Officials in university housing said the goal was to ensure students' safety. "We're just enforcing [the rule] we already had," said Craig Schmitt, director of university housing.

Visiting hours end at 10 p.m. on weeknights and at midnight on weekends, but the rules were not always strictly enforced. Now any visitor of the opposite sex caught in a dorm after hours can be arrested and charged with criminal trespass.

Regulations forbid propping open outside doors, although it was still a common practice last semester. Now, anyone caught propping open doors may be expelled from campus housing. The university also has removed all outside door handles on dormitory entrance doors, except at the main entrance, to keep out strangers.

> We can feel a lot safer at night knowing that not anyone who wants to can walk in the door.
> Dyana Blythe, a junior at JSU

The new policy demands that all visitors, not just males, leave a photo ID at the front desk.

David Nichols, director of public safety, said there have been fewer violent episodes this semester. "If there is an increase [in arrests], it is due to enforcement, not an increase in the incidents themselves," he said.

Dyana Blythe, a junior living in a dorm, is thankful for the new regulations. "We can feel a lot safer at night knowing that not anyone who wants to can walk in the door," she said.

Lawyer to speak on Free Trade

University Press Release

Andrew W. Shoyer will speak on "A North American Free Trade Agreement: Issues and Answers" Feb. 25 at 8 p.m. in Garey Hall, Room 102, at the University Law School.

The International Law Society and the Latin American Law Student Association of the University School of Law are sponsoring the speech.

Shoyer is an assistant general counsel in the Office of the United States Trade Representative (USTR) in Washington, D.C. He is responsible for providing legal counsel to the USTR and her staff on trade matters concerning Canada, Mexico, Latin America, the Caribbean Basin and Africa, as well as customs and tariff issues generally and in the current Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations.

His efforts have been focused principally on the coordination of legal work for the U.S. government in the North American Free Trade Agreement negotiations since June 1991.

Shoyer also provides legal advice for the negotiation of agreements under the Enterprise for the Americas Initiative and handles disputes on behalf of the U.S. Government that arise under the free-trade agreements with Canada and Israel.

Prior to joining USTR's Office of General Counsel in 1990, Shoyer practiced international trade law with the Washington, D.C., office of Arnold and Porter. He completed his undergraduate studies at the University of Pennsylvania in 1981, received his law degree from Georgetown University Law Center and master's degree from the Georgetown University School of Foreign Service in 1986.

A wine and cheese reception and a question and answer period will be held in the Reuschlein Room of Garey Hall following the speech.

Class overcrowding hits record high in Illinois

By College Press Service

Overcrowded classes are nothing new to the University of Illinois in Chicago, but budget cuts and a change to the semester system seem to have put overenrollment at a record high, administrative officials say.

"It's been a mess," said Barbara Wood, acting head of the communications and theater department.

"I've given directions to the people in charge of registration that the seniors should get priority," said Chancellor James Stukel. "We invested some money, about $100,000, to open more sections."

Stukel pointed out that this semester's overcrowded classes are "worse in the sense that classes are tougher to get." He added that "students should do whatever they can to get courses they need for graduation."

Some said the problems were caused partly by last fall's change from a quarter system to a semester system, while other courses were eliminated or the number of sections reduced because of budget cuts.

In order to alleviate some of the overcrowding, administrators have turned to checking student records to confirm that the student belongs in the class.

"I would say that for a good half-dozen of our courses, we had to go into our files to verify major and standing," Wood said. "We try to give precedence to seniors and those with the prerequisites," he said.

Though only qualified students — those who are of the appropriate major and have completed the prerequisites for the class — are supposed to be able to enroll in a class, some faculty have admitted to "bending the rules" whenever possible.

"It's always been on an ad hoc basis with the individual instructor," said Virginia Wexman, director of undergraduate studies in English. Wexman added that "it's always been the policy [of the English department] that prerequisites are necessary for success in any course."

Some students have related horror stories about being dropped from class without being notified.

"After the fifth week, a girl in my math class went to drop the course," said Patrick Nickels, a junior in chemistry. "When she looked up her file, she found that she had been dropped by the department during the first week."

"Most classes are labs and we stop it at the number of seats available, then we add another lab section if we have to," said Sharon Mistele, assistant to the head of physics. "We opened two labs this semester because there were too many students."

VP appointed to Pennsylvania public television commission

University Press Release

The Rev. George F. Riley, O.S.A., vice president for University Relations, has been appointed to the Pennsylvania Public Television Network Commission (PTN).

Announcement of Riley's appointment was made this week by Gov. Robert P. Casey. The commission determines the future of public television in the state of Pennsylvania.

A native of Methuen, Mass., Riley has been a major administrator at Villanova since 1972. He has a Ph.D. from The Catholic University of America.

Riley will be the representative of private education on the public television commission. The PTN links the seven independent noncommercial television stations in Pennsylvania to create a system in which stations provide programming to the public through independent and group efforts.

New legislation outlaws disability discrimination

University Press Release

The recent passage of the Americans With Disabilities Act (ADA) outlaws discrimination against persons with disabilities, opening doors to them in private sector employment and accessibility to public services, accommodations, transportation and telecommunications.

The Rev. Shawn Tracy, O.S.A., director of Villanova's Campus Ministry Office, has vigorously voiced the rights of specially challenged individuals long before the legislation became a reality.

To raise awareness of the problems encountered by persons with special needs, Tracy has taught a course for 10 years focused on "Persons With Disability and the Church." This year Villanova's religious studies department is sponsoring the course Feb. 21-22 on campus.

The course identifies problems confronting both disabled and non-disabled individuals in the religious community and its institutions. "The ADA recognized weaknesses in the national system, but the Church feels that the lack of awareness about obstacles which exclude the disabled is a real weakness in its spiritual systems which needs to be addressed," Tracy said.

"This course is about attitudes. Its purpose is to sensitize students by educating them about the attitudinal and structural barriers that people who have disabilities contend with," said Tracy .

The weekend seminar features discussions by recognized disabled and non-disabled church and community leaders who are advocates for the disabled. They include John Keck, co-founder of the New York headquarters of Handicapped Encounter Christ (HEC); Maureen Scanlon, of the Jewish Guild for the Blind; and Margie Kernicky and James Haynal, two Villanova students with disabilities.

The speakers will lead an exchange of dialogue among the students, enabling them through group interaction to recognize, analyze and critique the unique problems experienced by disabled individuals within the mainstream Church community according to the current views of the Catholic Church in the United States.

Students also read several documents dealing with issues concerning the disabled, including the "U.S. Catholic Bishops Statement on Handicapped People." At the end of the workshop, they are required to write a paper reflecting their experience in the workshop as well as their reactions to the Bishops' pastoral publication.

"The experience is an enriching one for the students," Tracy said. "The real message of the course is that guilt or attitude is something you don't have to have. They learn to relate the insight to their own lives."

In 1977 the Augustinian priest initiated the campus-based Philadelphia chapter of HEC, a religious retreat, and he has for many years lobbied to ensure that structural renovations on campus included accessibility for disabled individuals.

International Education Bill increases opportunities to study abroad

By College Press Service

More college students will be able to study abroad under an education bill that was signed into law by President Bush, Jan. 15.

The National Security Education Act of 1991, authored by Sen. David Boren (D.-Okla.), increased the amount of federal funding for undergraduate foreign studies and was expected to give more middle- and low-income students and minorities more opportunities to study abroad.

According to Boren's office, most students who want to study abroad now have to raise private funds for their trips. Currently, only 42,000 U.S. college students study abroad each year and 75 percent of them go to five Western European countries. Other nations send 356,000 college students to study in the United States every year.

"Our entire nation suffers as a result of our ignorance of international languages and cultures, and it is my hope that this legislation will provide part of the means to create the international outlook we must have if we are to keep this country at peace and prosperous," the senator said.

Funding for scholarships was set at $12 million, a tenfold increase from current levels. Boren's program also will provide fellowships to graduate students to study foreign languages and area studies, as well as grants to universities to create or expand foreign studies programs.

Contemporary stories reflect ancient epic style

By JIM ROWLEY
Staff Reporter

Dr. William Labov, professor of linguistics and psychology at the University of Pennsylvania, spoke about how contemporary vernacular stories make use of stylistic techniques similar to those employed by ancient epic storytellers Feb. 13 in the Radnor Room of the Connelly Center.

Labov read excerpts of recordings he made of people telling the stories of important events in their lives. After analyzing these personal narratives, Labov concluded that they effectively utilized techniques of epic style.

In the academic world, Labov's name is associated with the subject area called "socio-linguistics."

"He created the field and defined its terminology," said Dr. Lucy McDiarmid, Villanova professor of English. Socio linguistics concerns the study of the way people talk and why, she said.

Labov promotes the ethical and non-hierarchical use of language, McDiarmid said.

Labov emphasized the positive qualities of the tales, rather than concentrating on the storyteller's adherence to conventional grammar and diction. The true importance is "the skill of the storyteller in retaining the interest of the audience," Labov said.

After beginning his career as an industrial chemist at an ink factory in New Jersey, Labov continued his formal education, earning his doctorate in psychology from Columbia University in 1964. His specialization later turned to the different ways in which various ethnic sub-cultures of large urban areas in the northeastern United States use the English language.

Labov's books include Language in the Inner City, Sociolinguistic Patterns and a collection of work by Uriel Weinreich that he edited entitled, On Semantics.

College campuses face LSD usage

By College Press Service

LSD's kaleidoscope colors, shapes and designs — as well as its darker sides — are revealing themselves again to college students in the 1990s.

Although many thought the controversial drug died with the hippie culture of the 1960s, LSD is far from gone.

"How did LSD creep out of Bohemia into an upper-middle class frenzy? It was advertising," said Dr. Daniel X. Freedman, professor of psychiatry and psychology at UCLA, who has researched the effects of LSD on the brain since the late 1950s. "I saw LSD discovered 17 times in the popular press between 1960 and 1965 ... Part of it is the allure of this odd experiece. There is definitely some renewed interest. I can tell you that from my telephone."

Known as one of the nation's experts on the drug, Freedman said that although LSD never went away, it is certainly back in vogue among drug users, scientists, the media, drug counselors and enforcement agents.

At a recent national conference in San Francisco that addressed the renewed popularity of the drug, Robert Bonner of the Drug Enforcement Agency offered his reason for the upsurge.

"Kids today really have no knowledge of the adverse effects of LSD. And I'm afraid it's been said those who don't know history are doomed to repeat it," Bonner said.

Since 1938, when Dr. Albert Hofmann synthesized lysergic acid diethylamide in Switzerland, the drug has been called everything from "God in a pill" to the ultimate illusion of hell. Opinion toward the drug is still divided.

Students polled on alcohol

she is at a party or by themselves. This person abuses alcohol regularly and cannot manage without it," responded a sophomore arts and sciences student.

Several respondents felt that an alcoholic was a person that needed to drink to deal with their life, according to the results of the poll. An alcoholic is "one who needs to drink to get through life and their daily problems," responded a freshman arts and sciences student.

Also, most students believed that binge drinking was simply drinking to get drunk. Binge drinking is "slamming beers to get drunk for no other reason than to be drunk," responded a sopomore arts and sciences student.

Of those students polled, 56 percent responded that they drink at least once a week and 75 percent have gotten sick as a result of excessive drinking. Also, 58 percent of the respondents said that they do things that they would not normally do after drinking alcoholic beverages.

The poll also found that 92 percent of respondents would attend a social function that did not serve alcohol.

Many students responded that they did not feel pressure to drink, yet they encouraged their friends to drink, according to the poll. Overall, 10 percent of students said that they felt pressure to drink and 24 percent encouraged their friends to drink.

Some students said that their drinking habits began in high school, according to the results of the poll. Forty percent of students responded that they drank alcohol regularly at parties in high school.

"Since 1966, the number of high school students nationwide intoxicated at least once a month has more than doubled, from 10 percent to more than 20 percent," according to information from the National Council on Alcoholism, Inc.

Thirty-five percent of students said that they have a false identification card. Also, 52 percent of students responded that they had driven a car after consuming alcohol.

"An estimated 3.3 million drinking teenagers aged 14 to 17 are showing signs that they may develop serious alcohol-related problems," according to the National Council on Alcoholism, Inc.

This issue is one of the most important problems that the Center for Alcohol and Drug Assistance encounters, said Lynne Hincken of the center.

Alcohol may contribute to fatal illnesses, including cardiac myopathy, hypertensive diseases, pneumonia and several types of cancer.

Athletic facilities need upgrading

Have you ever wanted to play basketball at Jake Nevin Fieldhouse on a Saturday morning? How many times have you found that the courts are being used by people outside the community or a University varsity team is occupying it? This sight is common. Athletic facilities for students at the University are lacking and must be upgraded.

On campus, there exist only two weightrooms open for students: one at Jake Nevin, the other at Stanford. There are fewer than 10 basketball and tennis courts. Also, many of the facilities are dominated by varsity and club team practices. Over 6,000 students are being served inadequately.

Many students enjoy a pick-up basketball game or a weight training exercise a few times a week. Unfortunately, they are not able to do so because the administration does not fund student athletics and provide the necessary facilities. The 1991 budget devoted only three percent of its expenses to the Athletic Department and most of that money was spent on maintenance and facilities management, not construction. Students pay $17,000 tuition to attend a high-caliber institution, both academically and athletically. Unfortunately, these standards are not met.

An example of the administration's lack of concern for students took place on the morning of Feb. 15. All basketball courts were closed at Jake Nevin, Butler Annex and duPont Pavilion because the University hosted a national high school swim meet.

Also, when the University decided to build the new Liberal Arts center behind Corr in January 1991, it meant the tearing down of four basketball/tennis courts. Thirteen months later, the University has still not replaced the courts.

If the University is going to host sporting events, it should at least have alternative facilities. If it is going to tear down facilities, it should replace them elsewhere.

N.H. primary strikes a chord

What are we to make of the results of Tuesday's presidential primary in New Hampshire? As Pennsylvania's primary approaches quickly, we must begin to consider the credibility of the candidates.

The New York Times reported Wednesday that the results serve as "a lightning bolt for the status quo." Republican Pat Buchanan and Democrat Paul Tsongas surprised many analysts. Their messages are striking responsive chords in voters fed up with current domestic turmoil.

The November election is critical to both our national and individual futures. Even if we feel sheltered from the outside world, all of us must consider the nation's economic status. As pocketbooks are pinched, confusion grows and anger rises.

A Villanova student was overheard recently saying, "I don't have time to consider [the election]. But I do feel it needs my attention." Well, the time for consideration has come.

Our job as voters is to dig deeply into the issues. For most students, this election will be the first in which they can vote for a presidential candidate. Think about the implications for the next four years. Some of us will be seeking jobs, and some of us will be struggling to pay tuition.

The time for change has come. A recent election year campaign to "throw the bums out" failed miserably with a majority of incumbents returned to office. We must take responsibility for tomorrow.

LETTERS

University provides assistance

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to last week's letter about the University's support of its off-campus resident population. Contrary to the implications of the letter, the University does care about students living off-campus. As the Villanovan reported in September, Student Life hired as the new assistant to the Dean of Students a person with a legal background so that off-campus student concerns could be more adequately addressed.

Among my other responsibilities as assistant to the Dean, I am available five days a week to help students with legal questions that they have or that arrive, uninvited, into their lives. I regularly talk with students about their leases, their landlord problems and their underage drinking citations. No one is turned away, though if I am not the best person to help, I may refer a student elsewhere in the University community.

I understand that students are sometimes frustrated by the treatment they receive by the local police and the local community. Life is not always fair and that is unfortunate. But no one at the University is happy when students are not treated fairly. The University does care and does offer help to students. The Dean of Student Office, the Legal Information Center located in the basement of Sheehan, the Off-Campus Advisor in Residence Life and the Counseling Center are just some of the resources available.

Students must realize, however, that there are some things that the University has no control over. The legal age in Pennsylvania to purchase, consume, possess or transport alcoholic beverages is 21. The University has no power to change that or to suggest that local authorities ignore the law. Many of the zoning laws appear to discriminate against students. But study your constitutional law and you will learn that students are not a specially protected group and, therefore, some discrimination is constitutionally permissible.

Ask me or one of your political science teachers about it. Recently, several landlords, as property owners with standing to challenge the ordinances, have done exactly that. The University will be as pleased as the students if the court decides that the ordinances unconstitutionally discriminate against students.

Most students enjoy living off-campus. It is a time to set up an apartment or house for the first time with friends. Off-campus residents enjoy a lot of freedom with minimal responsibilities of job and family. Yet complete freedom is not possible.

The reality is that normal rules of society apply to off-campus life. Be a good neighbor. Don't disturb your neighbors or their property. Consume alcoholic beverages legally. The reality is that people do not always treat other people fairly.

When students are faced with the realities of these rules, the University is happy to help to the extent it reasonably can. Truly, we are here for you.

dean of Students

Questions to ponder

1. Have you heard of the "I'm Free for the Weekend" program sponsored by the Center for Alcohol and Drug Assistance? How does it affect you? Are you participating?
2. Are you aware this is Black History Month? Which on-campus event will you attend to participate in the celebration?
3. Have you ever attended a campus lecture? Why did you go? What did you learn?
4. Do you read a daily newspaper? Why or why not? Which paper?
5. When was the last time you complimented your best friend? What did you say? Why?
6. Are you aware of the current problems in Haiti? Should the U.S. government return Haitian refugees to their homeland? Why is the Organization of American States enforcing an embargo on Haiti?
7. If you eat on campus, do you use styrofoam cups or glasses at dinner? When was the last time you went to breakfast?
8. Is America really behind its Olympic team? Does it really matter how much the U.S. team wins?
9. When was the last time you stopped at a yellow light?
10. Have you upheld any of your New Year's Resolutions? Why or why not? What could you do differently?

COMMENTARY

Bush's economic policy needs Barbara's direction

By ELLEN GOODMAN

There are many, many things that George Bush could learn from his wife. Warmth, for one. Grace, for another. Syntax, for a third. That would be nice. The ability to convey the sense of a person at ease in his own skin.

There are other things George could use if only Barbara could bring them to her marriage as part of a political dowry. Her job approval ratings, for example. Or her popularity.

But on Feb. 19, he borrowed a line from his wife that could have used a good leaving alone. In his official announcement for re-election he quoted his "favorite political philosopher, Barbara Bush." He said: "What happens in your house is more important than what happens in the White House."

Bush knows no more about family life in America than he knows supermarkets. He has disconnected public life from private life and government from the everyday concerns of family.

Well, not exactly. Not always.

I had heard that sentiment from the First Lady herself in June of 1990. On a controversial commencement day at Wellesley College she told an audience of undergraduate women, "Your success as a family, our success as a society, depends not on what happens in the White House but what happens inside your house."

Barely a month later, her husband had vetoed the Family and Medical Leave Act. This modest centerpiece of any sane family policy, a bill that would have given millions of workers with a new baby or a seriously ill family member up to 12 weeks of job protected unpaid leave, died on Pennsylvania Ave.

What happens in your house — if you are working and pregnant, if you want to keep a job and care for a dying parent — may be directly affected by what happened that day in the White House.

So, his announcement speech is fair warning that we are in for another round of family rhetoric but not a word of family policy. We are in for more talk about family values but not a sentence about family supports.

The president's fans called out "Four more years! Four more years!" Indeed, he is running for the fourth term of the Reagan administration, for four more years during which to tell American families: ask not what your government can do for you.

"You see, America's future doesn't take shape in small rooms with heavy polished wooden desks," said the president. "It takes place in homes where parents read to their children, talk about responsibility, teach them values, show them how to love one another, respect one another, and work hard, live good lives."

As parents, we do not need to be told that children are raised best by caring families. Love and discipline, affection and attention — this is the stuff of private life. Government, after all, does not stay up late comforting children. Government does not help with their homework or worry when they are out late at night.

But what happens when the child we are trying to comfort is sick and we cannot afford a doctor? What if we have to choose between being there to help with the homework or working a second shift to save for college? What if "your house" is being lost to the economy?

The president tells us, "Parents, not government, should make the important decisions about health, child care and education." He says, "I believe in personal responsibility."

Exactly what decisions can a parent make about health without insurance? About child care if the slots are filled and the prices high?

As for personal responsibility? French parents are not turned into irresponsible louts because their government supports widespread and high-quality child care. European families are not shattered by paid maternity leave. Canadians do not consider a health care system a private matter. And quality education is not left to the individual in Japan.

American families thrive in a supportive environment and can fail in one that leaves them adrift. The help we need is not the sort that displaces parents, but that enables us to do the job.

Bush knows no more about family life in America today than he knows about supermarkets. He has disconnected public life from private life and government from the everyday concerns of family. But responsibility is a collective word and community is more than a thousand points of light. And what happens to the White House this election year depends on what happens in your house.

As for Barbara, I will quote the words another "political philosopher" found on a placard in New Hampshire: "We like you, Barbara! But you're sleeping with the enemy."

How do you define an alcoholic? Do you know anyone who is an alcoholic?

An alcoholic is somebody who drinks so much that they affect other people in a negative way. I do not know any alcoholics myself.

Tim Bayer
Sophomore
Engineering

An alcoholic constantly drinks and insists that they do not have a problem or they use drinking as an excuse to calm them down. I personally do not know an alcholic, but I also do not know how to pinpoint one either.

Kelly Phillips
Junior
Nursing

An alcoholic is somebody that cannot deal or cope in life without it. The alcohol becomes a necessary part of their life. The one person who I knew as an alcoholic inherited the disease from his father.

Tino Luzano
Senior
Finance

Those who do not know their limits or refuse to listen to people trying to help them are alcoholics. I have heard that other people on campus are having trouble with alcohol, but I do not know anyone who is an alcoholic.

Piros Mar
Sophomore
Nursing

A definition of an alcoholic is when a person cannot stop drinking until they overdo it. It is hard to classify the students I know [as] alcoholics. But, we are all alcoholics in a way.

COMMENTARY

Peace and Justice circulates one-sided analysis

By MORTON A. KLEIN

For many years, the Villanova University Center for Arab and Islamic Studies (Arab Center) has promoted a consistent refrain of biased anti-Israel programs, writings and lectures. Recently, there seemed to have been a small, refreshing pause in this troublesome rhetoric by Villanova and its Arab Center.

Beginning late last spring and continuing this fall there have been no anti-Israel documentaries, and the pro-Arab speakers have been somewhat more restrained. In addition, Dr. Thomas Ricks, assistant director of the Villanova Arab Center, asked me for a list of five pro-Israel speakers, with the assurance he would invite one or more to the campus. (He privately acknowledged that the Arab Center had never invited a pro-Israel speaker to Villanova since its inception in 1983.)

> Some constituents of the Villanova University community not only exclude certain points of view, they also do not demand a rigorous adherence to certain objective truths.

Even though there has been slow movement in the right direction by the Villanova Arab Center, the Villanova Center for Peace and Justice has now taken up the anti-Israel cudgel. It began by inviting the well-known Jewish critic of Israel Michael Lerner to speak. More recently, the Center for Peace and Justice has published a disturbing article in its Winter 1991 Newsletter that sounds more like the Iraq Gazette than a Villanova newsletter. It ends with a plea more appropriate for an Arab PAC than a university newsletter to "write or call your Congresspersons demanding that Israel stop settlements and end its occupation if it is to receive U.S. aid." The beginning of the article was just as bad. It states that the West Bank and Gaza Strip are "annexed lands" with "almost 200,000 Jews." Of course, these areas have never been annexed and have only 100,000 Jews. It states that the settlements are "against international law." However, former Undersecretary of State Eugene Rostow, U.N. Representative Arthur Goldberg and Secretary of State William Rogers, among numerous other officials and legal experts have refuted this claim.

The newsletter bemoans the fact that during the Camp David Accords "the Palestinian issue was left unresolved." Unmentioned is the fact that the Palestinians were offered immediate semi-autonomy with a more permanent resolution later that was rejected by the Palestinians. The Villanova newsletter also complained that "aid was never linked to the settlement issue," yet these Christians of Villanova University never require that similar amounts of aid to Egypt be linked to the shocking oppression and yearly massacres of the 12 million coptic Christians living in Egypt.

Many other falsehoods abound such as "Israel receives $5 billion in aid . . . and $50-800 million must be set aside for the loan guarantees . . . and is an additional cost to the U.S. taxpayer." The Villanova Peace and Justice accountants have overestimated Israeli aid by $2 billion and need more training to understand that this set-aside is at no cost to the U.S. taxpayer (not to mention that Israel has agreed to pay this set-aside).

A further appeal to our emotions is made by claiming that "80 percent of those under occupation are living in poverty due to loss of valuable land and subsequent loss of work opportunities." Omitted is the fact that the Executive Director of the UN Environment Programme, Dr. Mustafa Tolba, an Egyptian, recently praised Israel for making "exceptional progress" during the past 20 years of administering the territories resulting in longer average lifespans and reduced infant mortality. Israel has also dramatically increased the level of material goods per family in the territories, i.e. number of cars, toasters, refrigerators, washers, dryers, etc.

Finally, the newsletter argues that "true peace in the Middle East will only be a reality with justice for the Palestinians." Does the Villanova Center for Peace and Justice really believe that "justice for the Palestinians" would have eliminated the Iran-Iraq war, Syria's destruction and takeover of Lebanon, the oppression of Christians by and poverty of Egypt, the 30,000 Syrians murdered in Hama by Assad, the murder of tens of thousands of Kurds, the Iraq-Kuwait-U.S. war, the enslavement and murder of blacks in Sudan, the murder, torture and deportation of thousands of blacks in Mauritania?

The only hope for "true peace" in the Middle East lies not in the resolution of the Arab-Israel-Palestinian Arab conflict. The only hope lies first in the elimination of fascist dictatorships in the Arab countries, replacing them with democracies. Secondly, it lies in the establisment of true concern for human rights in the Arab countries. Thirdly, it lies in the true recognition of Israel's right to exist by the Arab countries. When the Arab countries begin to spend their wealth on improving the lives of their own people and not in more arms — that is when peace will really come to the Middle East.

One realizes that a university, by its very nature, provides an atmosphere for the open discussion of all political perspectives. But some constituents of the Villanova University community not only exclude certain points of view, they also do not demand a rigorous adherence to certain objective truths.

When Villanova's Center for Peace and Justice and Arab and Islamic Studies take this extra step and provide a platform for the circulation of one-sided analyses and outright falsehoods, it undermines Villanova University's high academic standards of scholarship by crossing the boundary from legitimate debate into outright propaganda.

Poor conditions demand attention

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the workers of the Athletic Department concerning the conditions of the athletic facilities. It is unfortunate that the workers at the athletic facilities took Carl Baker's comments as a reflection of their work. I think that Mr. Baker was not attempting to criticize your performance or the quality of your work. Rather he was just exposing an issue that deserves more attention and is a reflection on the University itself and not its workers.

The University supports many varsity and club sports, but it seems that it does not provide adequate funds or facilities for the majority of students here at Villanova. I use the Nevin weight room as an example of the deplorable conditions. I do not think the University or whoever is in charge of this facility realizes just how many people use it. During the week it is hard to find space in the weight room to move around, much less work out.

First of all, the room is too small and needs desperate expansion or relocation. This lack of space is frustrating and sometimes dangerous. Second, the equipment in the room is totally inadequate for a university of this caliber. We pay an enormous tuition and deserve to have quality equipment that is contemporary and safe to use. One piece of equipment has been broken since early January. Third, the structural makeup of the room is terrible. What I mean by this is that the walls are literally falling apart. We deserve better.

The concerns that have been expressed in this letter have been brought to the attention of those in a position to change things, most importantly Student Government. The only response is that the students are the cause of the bad conditions in the weight room because they abuse the facility. This response is not acceptable because it is still the responsibility of the University to supply quality facilities and equipment for the students. The students that use the weight room do respect the equipment and the facility because they know if anything breaks it will not be fixed for at least a year. The conditions are ridiculous and we are outraged. We and the students of the weight room, both men and women, demand an improvement.

"Buddy Program" brings light into life of special duo

By PEGGY AGOLINO
Assistant Features Editor

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) is a term that leaves many of us feeling scared and confused. We know it is a growing problem yet we are not sure what we personally can do to help. There are many ways that people from all walks of life can make the life of an AIDS victim a little bit easier — such as what the Rev. Don Reilly, O.S.A., is doing.

Four years ago Reilly decided he wanted to do something to help people whose lives are affected by AIDS, so he went to an organization in Philadelphia called Action AIDS. This group has several programs that help both people who are HIV positive and people who have developed AIDS.

Reilly wanted to be a part of the Buddy Program, which provides an infected person with a friend, someone to shop for them, to go to a movie with or to just listen for a while. "The purpose of the program is to do things with the person so they don't feel isolated and they don't let the virus overwhelm them," said Reilly. People who need buddies come from varying backgrounds and lifestyles and range in age from infants to adults.

Reilly, who is the Assistant Provincial of Augustinians and who taught a mini-course on AIDS at Villanova, was not able to immediately participate in the program. He was required to go through an interview, which took longer than usual. At the time he interviewed, he was the first priest attempting to be a part of the program. Following the meeting, he attended a four-day workshop where he was able to meet people who are infected with AIDS. The sessions also made the participants familiar with medical terms and precautions of which they should be aware.

> "The purpose of the program is to do things with the person so they don't feel isolated and they don't let the virus overwhelm them."

"The training clears up misconceptions. It was an introduction to the world of people with AIDS," said Reilly.

After training, Reilly was assigned a buddy. Much to his surprise, he was paired up with a 13-month-old boy named Thaddeus (Tad). Tad was abandoned in a warehouse at this young age and is presently living in a foster home in Roxboro. He had many female figures in his life, and his foster family though he needed a male figure, so they put in a request for a buddy.

Tad is HIV positive but is doing very well. He is now 3 and a half years old. According to Reilly who has been with him for over two years, "He is a blessing, he is happy and fun to be with." The pair spends several hours together every week.

There are many ways people can get involved with the AIDS cause. People are needed to do things from being a buddy to delivering food. Action AIDS provides many services, including the buddy program, which currently has over 300 volunteer buddies. If anyone is interested in

'Novan's offer peer assistance

By SETON M. ALVES
Senior Reporter

There is no denying that parties are an integral part of college life and as a result alcohol cannot be ignored. Most students are able to keep their alcohol consumption under control, but "social drinking" sometimes advances into alochol abuse with serious consequences. The Center for Drug and Alcohol Assistance offers counseling and special programs to any student seeking help or information about the dangers of substance abuse. In addition to the regular counseling staff, the Center also sponsors a Peer Assistance program for the third straight year.

"Our goal was to invite students interested in helping others to provide education on alcohol and drugs to the University community," said Jan Janosik, director of the Center. Each spring, students are asked to submit applications and participate in two levels of interviews. "We are looking for students who are basically healthy themselves," said Janosik. "They don't need to abstain from drinking, but we do ask them to make a commitment not to use illegal drugs," she added.

The program seeks students who feel well-integrated into the community as well as those who have worked through enough of their own personal problems in order to help others.

The program consists of about 12 to 15 students who go through extensive training in developing effective programs, time management, basic listening skills and assertiveness. "We don't train them to be counselors," said Janosik. The students are asked to devote five to 10 hours per week to the Peer Assistance program. The group meets every other week for training and social activities as well. Topics such as addictions, love dependencies and coping techniques are discussed.

The major role of the Peer Assistants is to develop programs for the University community. "The counselors give them topics to research, and the students put together their own programs. We meet with them to critique what they have developed before the program is ready for presentation," said Janosik.

Some popular programs include: "How Much Is Too Much?" discussing social drinking versus high-risk drinking; "Booze, Drugs And Your Love Life," concerning the effects of alcohol and drugs on sexuality as well as information on AIDS and Date Rape; and "For Women Only," an in-depth exploration of the unique effects of drugs and alcohol on the female body.

Janosik said that the University response to these programs has been positive. Those who have attended any of the programs have given them favorable evaluations. "'These programs are a good outreach for the Center," said Janosik. "Students can get facts, build awareness and seek further help if necessary as a result of the programs." Janosik also explained that the Peer Assistants benefit from the programs as well; they dispel initial fears and build confidence.

The students in the Peer Assistance program are not publicized as peer counselors. "We want to create a subtle support system, and we are sensitive to the anonymity of others going through counseling," said Janosik. In this way, the Peer Assistants are neither overburdened nor harassed.

This year, the program will accept between seven and nine new Peer Assistants. "We usually

VEMS serves 'Nova community

By MATTHEW J. BRENNAN
Senior Reporter

A group of 30 students at the University has formed an emergency medical service (EMS) that could mean the difference between life and death.

The Villanova Emergency Medical Service (VEMS), a volunteer club, provides the campus with free, first response emergency medical care often crucial in life-and-death situations and convenient in treating minor sicknesses and injuries.

VEMS is one of two student-run emergency medical services in the Philadelphia area. The other is the 8-year-old West Chester University Emergency Medical Service (WCUEMS), according to Norman Wallace, VEMS advisor and assistant director of Residence Halls for the Department of Public Safety.

Wallace first experienced student-run emergency medical service while working at West Chester University in West Chester, Pa., for five years at their Department of Public Safety.

"At West Chester I saw it was possible for students to care for each other quite well, if the University provided the proper infrastructure," said Wallace, an Emergency Medical Technician (EMT) who was certified through the VEMS program and has been at Villanova since 1989. "Television shows like Rescue 911 have increased the public's expectations of EMS, so there is a growing demand for the pre-hospital care."

Wallace has always tried to guide the group with an eye on the liability and also the possibilities.

"It is not unreasonable to think that one day there will be a fully staffed Villanova ambulance service," said Wallace.

But for now, VEMS provides the patient with pre-hospital care before the ambulance arrives.

The group currently responds to an average of 10 calls per week, treating injuries ranging from minor sprained ankles and illnesses to major broken bones and choking victims. Although most of the calls are minor, the group is prepared to deal with serious traumas.

"Whenever you have a life-threatening situation, the quicker you have a response from an emergency medical service the more of a chance you have to provide the best care," said Doug Smith, a paramedic for Bryn Mawr Hospital with 11 years

V.U. Viewpoint: Campus rates alternatives to alcohol

By GRETCHEN FISHER
Assistant Features Editor

"Be Free for the Weekend," a three-day campaign to promote recreational alternatives to alcohol use, began yesterday and will continue until Sunday on campus. The campaign will sponsor lectures and demonstrations to make students aware of the dangers of alcohol use and abuse, and students can attend a number of alcohol-free events over the weekend.

Alcohol abuse is a serious problem affecting every age group in the United States. College campuses are no exception. Villanova students gave their opinions about the events (or lack thereof) held on campus that provide alternatives to parties and bars. Students also said whether or not they were going to participate in alcohol awareness weekend either by giving up drinking for the weekend, or by attending the scheduled events such as lectures, volleyball and a "mocktail" party.

Junior sociology major Kristi Cavanaugh and senior honors major Jen Rice were both thinking of giving up drinking for the weekend and planned to attend several of the activities. "Villanova definitely has more to offer," said Cavanaugh. "I can always find some non-alcoholic activities."

Rice agreed, "I think that there are a lot of non-alcoholic things to do," she said. "Some people just don't take advantage of them."

Franco Barbalinardo, a junior general science major, disagreed. "I really don't think that there is a lot to do unless you're in a fraternity or sorority or have ID. Unless you have these things, there are no other social outlets." Barbalinardo doesn't plan to give up drinking for the weekend and probably will not attend the lectures because, as he said, "I don't feel I have an alcohol problem so I don't think I need to attend any seminars about it."

Kelly Morley, a sophomore biology major, agreed but added that the campus itself offers only a "limited variety" of activities that are alternatives to parties and bars.

"Outside of the academic sphere, I feel, for the average person, Villanova offers nothing socially," said Pete Coletti, sophomore biology major. Albert Crowley, sophomore science/honors major, agreed. Both do not plan to take part in the weekend's events, and Crowley said he had not "even heard of any of the activities or seminars."

Freshman arts major Jennifer Anderson has pledged to be alcohol-free for the weekend. "There are a lot of other things out there besides alcohol. A good weekend doesn't always involve drinking. You can always see a movie, catch a basketball game or hang out with friends."

Although freshman business major Eric Ricciardi will not drink this weekend, he does not plan on attending the alcohol-free activities. "I feel Villanova has a lot to offer besides drinking. There is always intramural sports, movies on campus, basketball games and Philadelphia is close by," he said.

"I enjoy drinking enough that I do not have the desire to find alternative means," said freshman arts/general major Stephen Vighi. He does not plan on taking part in alcohol awareness weekend. "I feel I've been raised responsibly enough with alcohol that I really don't need to prove to myself that I am responsible," he said.

'Nova engineers work with NASA on space shuttle

By SUSAN BURNS
Staff Reporter

The members of the Villanova Space Shuttle Experiment program might have their heads in the clouds, but their minds are rooted in the practical and challenging world of scientific experimentation. They are currently working on two projects that will soon be launched with the space shuttle.

Through NASA's "Get Away Special" (GAS) program, the students design, develop, assemble and test their own equipment with the help of the space center. These experiments are then conducted aboard the shuttle.

"We are working with the kind of thing that happens in industry," said Karl Zimmer, an engineering design graphics professor who initiated the program eight years ago. "This is 'hands on' experience — not what you find in the classroom."

The approximately 20 students involved are divided into groups with different responsibilities. Some must research, design, test or even give formal presentations of the club's plans to companies. They request raw materials, free use of facilities or monetary contributions. A total of $151,400 is necessary to fund the experiments.

NASA offers some of its empty cargo space to educational institutions for learning through experimentation. Before the launch date, targeted for 1993, is reached, many advancements will be made.

"Work on our part of the experiment is going well. We'll definitely be done by the end of the semester," said senior Tony Cullen, an electrical engineering major. He and three others are designing software for the computer that will record the data and control the experiments while in space.

One such "experiment-in-the-making" involves the fabrication of polymers, or plastics. The two-part challenge includes creating electrically conductive polymers and polymers with the absence of gravity. "This means stronger plastics and better equipment on receive about 20 applications. The group consists mostly of juniors and seniors. Typically, there are more women," said Janosik. She added that for the first time, the program will choose several alternates this year.

The Peer Assistance program also helped counselors grow personally. Janosik said that they gain support from each other in addition to helping other students. The only disadvantage that Janosik sees is if a student is using the Peer Assistance program as a means of dealing indirectly with his or her own problems concerning substance abuse. "This would be a disappointment and disservice to the other members of the group," said Janosik.

In the college environment, a Peer Assistance program can only ease the pressures that go along with having fun. The program also provides the means by which the entire University community may increase its awareness of the potential dangers and consequences of having too much alcohol.

experience in EMS.

On the average, VEMS responds to calls in less than five minutes, a critical statistic when considering the response time for the local volunteer ambulance company can be anywhere from 10 to 45 minutes.

Volunteer systems continually face the problem of fully staffing their service during the week, often hindering their ability to respond quickly, according to Brian Herrick, the founder of VEMS and a senior political science major.

"Students who would not have called an ambulance for an alcohol-related problem or minor injury in the past will call us because they are more at ease calling a student rather than an outside agency," said Rob Panepinto, chief officer of VEMS and an EMT.

Wallace characterizes the group as unique because the students require state criminal history checks and possess advanced medical training that even the Public Safety officers do not have. Eight of the VEMS members volunteer for local or hometown corps and fire departments.

"We're not like any other club, we're a paraprofessional club that requires members to be certified by the state," said Herrick, who has been an EMT since he was 16. "We act as an intermediary between the patient and the ambulance, stabilizing the patient and providing pre-hospital care."

Members require certification in advanced first aid as provided in the First Responder, a non-credit 40-hour curriculum administered each semester by Fitzgerald Mercy Hospital in coordination with the Department of Health. The final exam tests the students' proficiency with practical response situations such as medical emergencies, trauma incidents and cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR). Georgetown University Emergency Response Medical Service (GERMS) agrees that it takes student programs a few years to get established.

Arnold said the Washington, D.C., ambulance services would get lost on campus and often took 45 minutes to arrive. "That long a response time is not acceptable, GERMS knows the campus well and can be on the scene in a few Earth and in space," said sophomore chemical engineer Padma Narayan of her work.

The other project is a test of the limitations of a heat pipe, an apparatus used for cooling. A heat pipe is an aluminum or stainless steel tube that has internal canals filled with liquid ammonia. When one end connects with a hot surface, the ammonia evaporates, travels to the opposite end to condense back into the liquid form, and then returns to the hotter side. This cyclic process has a cooling effect, without the use of mechanical movement.

The students plan to find the gravitational force at which the pipe most efficiently functions. This information will benefit the creators of satellites and, in the future, the manned space station project.

"I don't really know what long-term effects our experiments will have in the world," said freshman mechanical engineer Sarah Hartko of the group's efforts. Yet with dreams of someday working for NASA and possibly exploring space herself, she admitted, "Even though I know that before I die I won't see what others see in science fiction stories, I will have at least helped to get closer to it."

According to Zimmer, NASA has been keeping its eye on Villanova, helping the club since 1984 with its endeavor. "We have to satisfy NASA as to what we can do here. They look at our drawings very closely and check our progress."

Progress in all areas is being made; the team members seem to work together well and they are optimistic about their deadline. According to its members, this club is, without a doubt, out of this world.

Students give aid to homeless

By SCOTT M. SCHEIDT
Staff Reporter

Villanovans and Campus Ministry are lending a hand to Philadelphia's homeless as volunteers for the Street Outreach program run by the Philadelphia Committee for the Homeless.

Street Outreach is a publicly funded program involving non-student and student volunteers from schools such as Villanova, St. Joseph's, La Salle and Lower Merion High School. In groups of two to five people, they provide food and drink to the homeless four nights a week. However, the basic objective of the program is not to feed the homeless, but rather "to develop some kind of personal relationship and help them to do what they need in order to get off the streets," said David Raeker-Jordan, the coordinator of the program, located at 802 N. Broad St.

By establishing a personal relationship through offering a meal, the "802" volunteers are usually able to initiate dialogue with some of the homeless. Through this dialogue the volunteers are able to get to know the people who live on the street and find out more about their problems. It is usually through these personal relationships that the volunteers are able to convince a homeless person to get off the streets and provide them with information about shelters, drug or alcohol programs, legal assistance and a number of other services available to the homeless.

The Outreach volunteer groups cover four areas of the city: the parkway, Independence Mall, Rittenhouse Square and City Hall. At each location the volunteers hand out sandwiches, desserts and cups of tea to the homeless people they encounter.

"A lot of people we see know all about us," said Tom Booker, a "veteran" Outreach volunteer. Soon after, one could hear a yell from the homeless mass on the Family Courthouse steps, "802 ... my favorite crew!"

Many of the homeless in bare feet quickly left their blankets to thank students who offered food and assistance. During these moments, conversation often developed between the volunteers and the grateful homeless people. "Ya go to Villanova, huh ...," said a man as he bit into his sandwich and chewed it. "Didn't they get clobbered 82-46 against B.C.?"

Other conversations were not as light. These included stories about police brutality, being set on fire and how homeless people are being robbed by other homeless people. "You think that cops care if he catches the guy that robbed me?" asked one homeless person.

The car ride back to campus was quiet as thoughts were exchanged. "Most of them were pretty nice," said Steve Dow, a freshman engineer at Villanova.

"I don't think people would choose to be homeless just because we feed them," said Lisa La Carrubba, a junior at Villanova. "A lot of them are out there for various reasons."

"If the employer finds out that a person is homeless, it is likely that the homeless person will not get the job. It's a no-win situation sometimes. If I could make one plea it would be for more businesses to hire homeless people. I know it's risky, but it's a chance we have to take," said Chris Tierney, an M.B.A. student at Villanova.

minutes."

VEMS also affords practical experience for students in health care-related major courses of study that could prove valuable in their future work.

"I want to work in a trauma or critical care unit of a hospital, and there is only one way you learn that type of work: with hands on experience," said Michelle Lertora, sophomore nursing major and sergeant officer of VEMS. "VEMS is a mechanism for me to make a difference and I really like the responsibility."

Although VEMS has been successful in supplying quick response medical care thus far, the high costs of the medical supplies and equipment as well as the maintenance costs of a vehicle, recently donated to the group by a local hospital, have made the group's future uncertain.

Currently, the University's Student Activities Office grants VEMS $150 and the Department of Public Safety has contributed $1,200 in start-up funds from its budget.

"It costs a minimal budget of $1,500-$2,000 a year to run the group optimally," said Herrick, who spent 14 hours on call at Villanova's 1991 Homecoming.

For those students interested in upgrading their emergency medical proficiency, the VEMS program also offers a non-credit 120-hour curriculum for EMT certification. The EMT course costs the student $140 and the First Responder course, $75. Twelve of the 30 members have EMT certification while the rest hold First Responder certificates.

In addition to providing the campus with free emergency care 24-hours a day on weekends, VEMS services medical stand-by for everything from University sporting events to dance marathons as well as the largest Special Olympics Festival in the world held during the fall semester.

Precautions such as wearing rubber gloves when changing Tad were taken, but the fact that Tad is HIV positive has no effect on their relationship. Reilly said he decided to get involved to help others, but is receiving a great deal in return.

The 2-year-old organization hopes to expand its sporadic weekly service to a full 365 days a year, but scheduling around classes becomes difficult as academics take precedence. A total of 20 hours per month must be logged by members to retain active membership.

"We do ask a lot of members; not only does it take the students' money, but also their time and effort," said Herrick, who would like to increase the number of members. "We are lucky it only took us one year to get us this far; at other universities it took years."

Hap Arnold, director of the CPR Training Center at Georgetown University Medical Center and the founding advisor, recycled about 1,000 pounds of aluminum cans during Homecoming weekend to fund VEMS. "We only made $40 from the recycling."

Lucyna Gorski, director of Student Activities, said the group is the only one of its kind at the University requiring certification and that the administration appreciates its services.

In the hopes for expansion, the group has applied to Student Activities for $7,500 for next year but will have to iron out the essentials and await the result, according to Gorski.

"VEMS is special because in addition to student activities' guidelines, it must follow the quidelines of confidentiality for its patients that a University office follows for students," said Gorski, who also cited the group's working relationship with the Department of Public Safety as positive.

"You never know when you may be in a situation to help someone or even save their life," said Andrew Marino, a senior accounting major who became interested in EMS through his volunteer fire fighting with his hometown Volunteer Fire Department in Fairfield, N.J. "Knowing I've taken the responsibility to learn emergency medical care to help others rather than being helpless in a critical situation is rewarding."

Wayne exposes his cool world

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"When they called me up and asked me to write a book I said 'no way' and they said 'way,' I said 'no-oo wa-ay' and they said 'way,' I said 'noooooo waaaaay,' they said 'way!,' " claims Wayne Campbell, "Saturday Night Live" character played by actor Mike Myers author of the book along with Robin Ruzan, in the forward of his book, Extreme Close-Up.

This book lets you into the world of Wayne to the point of no return. In an A to Z type fashion, Extreme Close-Up is filled with every detail of how to be cool and not a sphincter boy. It's presented in a wacky Letterman type of fashion.

Features in the book vary from Top 10 lists to dialogue conversations with Charo. Some are: "Famous Waynes of All Time: Keenan Ivory Wayne, Wayne Ona Ryder and Wayne Newton" and "Songs Where It Sorta Sounds Like They're Saying Wayne: 'Penny Wayne,' 'Singin' in the Wayne' and 'Waynedrops Keep Fallin' on My Head'."

Top 10 lists are popular with Wayne as he lists his "Top Ten Babes of All Time: featuring Betty Rubble, Julia Roberts and Farrah Fawcett, who redefined hairstyles for an entire generation of mall chicks. Plus, "Top 10 Worst Babes of All Time: featuring Mrs. Howell from 'Gilligan's Isle,' Milton Berle (when he dressed up like a woman) and Babe Ruth (I'm sorry he doesn't do anything for me.)"

If Wayne ran the TV networks ... "I would broadcast the following shows: 'Battlestar Metallica,' 'Golden Girls-The Babe Years,' 'The Guns N' Roses Comedy Hour,' 'Designing Women-to Look Like Cindy Crawford,' and 'Metaltainment Tonight.' "

Wayne then ponders upon "questions that have plagued me for years, "Why are there two Darren Stevens in 'Bewitched? Why do Roadies carry so many keys? Why did Barney Rubble have two voices? and Why do people take those chemical glow sticks to concerts?"

The results? Wayne is in his own world. The book is a wild trip through Wayne's head exposing intricate details about a man and his vision: "I would redesign the White House to be made entirely of giant Legos. I would draft a constitution in which no individual would have the right to hassle another individual (i.e. giving someone an Indian burn or a wedgie.) All must party! Including the Amish who would party in their own plain way! In short, for each of us to find the party within and to make it a humongoid blowout! Oh, yeah. And it would be against the law to wear flood pants."

Bands play acoustic live

By MAURA RURAK
Assistant Entertainment Editor

The Best of Mountain Stage — Volume 2 Live is a rare compilation of acoustic treasures that has undoubtedly been overlooked by alternative music listeners. Mountain Stage, which is produced by West Virginia Public Radio, is a weekly, two-hour live performance radio program broadcast nationally on more than 100 stations. During any given night it features three or four guest acts that defy categorization. "We are an alternative show, a blues show, a folk show, a World Beat show; we like Celtic music, Baltic music, Art Rock, and funky New Orleans piano."

The basic philosphy behind Mountain Stage is to bring truly talented live performers to the radiowaves. Unfortunately, the industry is overrun with bands that are unable to write their own music and to perform without electronic help. On Mountain Stage all is live.

Mountain Stage exists only because there are bands who are willing to perform. Billy Bragg gives an amazing version of "Tank Park Saluute." John Wesley Harding's "You're No Good" provides a smooth, uncomplicated ryhthm while Jane Tabor gives a prelude to her "Red Wine and Promises." Perhaps the most commercially recognized track is R.E.M.'s modern classic "Losing My Religion." Evoking memories of their performance on MTV's "Unplugged," R.E.M. has transformed "Losing My Religion" from a digitally remastered track into an acoustic jewel.

Other contributions include Kathy Mattea's "Where've You Been," Robyn Hitchcock's "Arm of Love," "These Blues" by Jimmie Dale Gilmore, and John Prine singing an adorable "It's a Big Old Goofy World." The obvious talent is what makes this compilation work and the producers recognize the quality of the second volume. "These live performances are like snapshots — not posed and not touched up. We think you'll like the pictures."

The Best of Mountain Stage — Volume Two Live is dedicated to bringing live performances to the general public. The industry certainly seems to be lacking this type of album and it is a refreshing change to hear bands honestly play thier music. The state of West Virginia has discovered an untapped resource and broadcasts it on Mountain Stage.

Four Horsemen put the roll back into rock

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Four Horsemen guitarist, Haggis, spoke to David J. Criblez in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Dirty, grungy, gritty and raw are four ways to describe these Horsemen. They play hard, loud, Southern-soul music that rocks harder then most. Put Lynyrd Skynyrd, Black Crowes and Guns N'Roses in a blender and season it with a little Aerosmith and Rolling Stones, and the result is the Four Horsemen, a five-piece tag team that shakes faster then George Michael's behind. Their debut LP, Nobody Said It Was Easy, produced by Rick Rubin (Beastie Boys, Run DMC, the Cult,), is one of the year's best and fairs better then recent efforts by Metallica, Skid Row or Van Halen. They are heavyweights from the starting gate. The question is ... how long can they be held in their stall?

Four Horsemen guitarist Haggis (far left) used to be with the Cult.

VILLANOVAN: The Four Horsemen have a real Southern feel to them. How is that implemented in the band?

HAGGIS: "Nothing is implemented in this band, there is a great deal of volume and stamping of dirty ol'boots up and down. We don't analyze anything. Everybody is influenced by something, but by the end of the day we don't think about those things we just play. I give the music to the guys, then we do our thing to it. I'm not being weird or anything, it's simply the truth."

V: Where are you from and how did you come together?

H: "I'm from London. Frank is from Brooklyn, Ben and Dave are from Maryland and DimWit is from Vancouver. It's a long story. I met Frank in 1987. I wanted to form a band. I asked him if he could sing and he looked good. I knew Chuck Biscuits, the drummer of Danzig, and he introduced me to his brother, DimWit, our drummer. Ben was with a band called Scream which broke up, he joined us and the drummer joined Nirvana. I used to play with the Cult. Before that I was in Zodiac Mindwarp. I personally have a jagged history of rock-n-roll/fame and fortune which is how I met Rick Rubin, hence which is how we got signed to Def American."

V: How was working with Rick?

H: "He's fantastic. Simply a big fan and cheerleader pushing you on and on. The sound he creates is distinct and priceless."

V: The power behind your music is intense. Not many bands possess that strength. Where does it come from?

H: "I base it on the fact that everyone in the band is a good musician. It a belief in what we do. I can't say. It's a natural flow. Once I write the songs, the band's interpretation is genuine."

V: Many bands today start off with that power and then slowly dissipate once they get popular. How do you see this?

H: "At the beginning its just a bunch of guys jammin'. Money and fame doesn't come into it. Once a band becomes big, people fight over songs and the vision of the band is gone and the unit that they once had is broken apart. Time and differences come in. Bands should get better and tighter as they go along. You must grow but not to the point where you stray away from your original sound."

V: Do you write alone? How do you see it?

H: "There's two ways to do this ... my way or the wrong way. I feel comfortable with what I put out. I write through a clear vision of what I want. This way the band

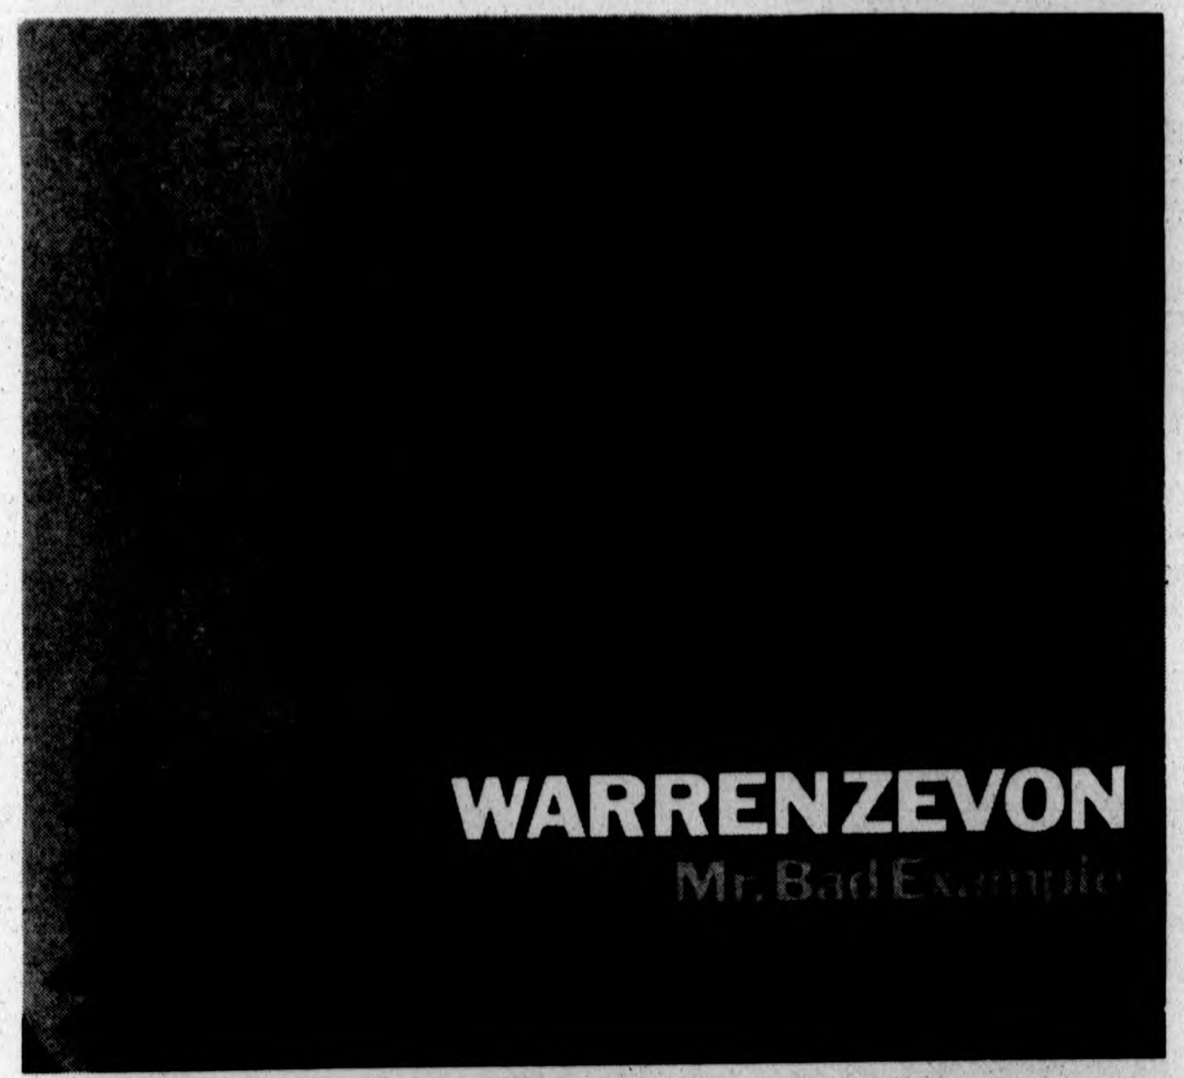
Zevon exhibits his insightful mature side



By JOHN KAZMIERCZAK
Staff Reporter

Versatility is the name of the game on Warren Zevon's new album Mr. Bad Example. Zevon, who is best known for his odd but catchy hits "Werewolves of London" and "Excitable Boy" expands his musical style in several new directions, bouncing between low-key, thoughtful songs and unusual pop offerings, even venturing into the realm of country and western.

Zevon's vocal talent and range are unquestionably the main attraction. He begins the album sounding like Lou Reed after a few cups of strong coffee on "Finishing Touches," then immediately downshifts into a nasal Tom Petty-ish whine for "Suzie Lightning." A passable Randy Travis imitation follows later in "Heartbreak Spoken Here."

Though Zevon's works were never known for introspection, Mr. Bad Example breaks from that image to a point, featuring deceptively insightful songs combined with surprisingly mature lyrics. "Angel Dressed In Black" and "Searching For A Heart" are prime examples of this newly-developed style. Zevon's trademark quirkiness has not faded completely, however, as it shines through as Zevon romps joyously through anthems about hedonism, double-dealing and ex-girlfriends on cuts such as "Things To Do When You're Dead In Denver," "Quite Ugly One Morning" and the title track.

Zevon romps joyously through anthems about hedonism, double-dealing and ex-girlfriends.

The versatility of Mr. Bad Example necessitates a skilled backup band; Zevon covers both keyboards and main vocals while producer Waddy Wachtel provides guitar and harmony. Bass and percussion are also featured, but are strongly emphasized in favor of Zevon and Wachtel's vocals-and-guitar combo.

Though Mr. Bad Example has its shortcomings, notably the above mentioned overdependence on vocals and guitar, they are few and far between and this album is a major step in the right direction for Zevon. He has combined his tried-and-true style through which he gained his popularity with a newer, multi-dimensional attitude which should insure success for years to come.

Dynagroove is a funk rock band which has gained local notoriety on the Philadelphia club scene for their danceable beats and spontaneous performances. According to lead guitarist and vocalist Erik Horvitz, the musicians keep their arrangements uncomplicated so that a groove rhythm is the focus of their music. The band has served as an opening act for Cyndi Lauper, George Clinton, the Hooters, and Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers. Dynagroove was also featured at a backstage party for a Rush concert at the Spectrum.

These live performances have given Dynagroove a hard-rocking reputation which extends outside of Pennsylvania to Delaware, the New Jersey shore and beyond. They were spotlighted with other local talents such as the Hooters and Heaven's Edge, on a WPHL-TV special called "Making it in Philadelphia" and their sound has also been praised on WMMR's Streetbeat. With such widespread recognition and increasing popularity, Dynagroove is a band on the rise, and will be at the 23 East Cabaret Feb. 21.

Dynagroove was also featured at a backstage party for a Rush concert at the Spectrum.

FLASH: Outspoken rapper Ice-T will appear Feb. 27 at the Chestnut Cabaret with his hard rock backup band Body Count. The band's first single "Body Count" was featured on the Just Say Anything collection. Ice-T and the musicians gained their first live experiences together on the Lollapalooza tour this summer and tracks by the band were also featured on Ice's Straight Up Nigga. Ernie-C., Sean-E-Sean, Sean-E-Mac, D-Rock, Mooseman, and Beatmaster-V will continue to supply the powerful heavy metal backing for Ice-T's boldly honest raps.

Ice-T has frequently been at the center of controversy because of his crusade against the music censorship groups who have continually given his records the "parental advisory" stamp of disapproval. Despite the narrow minds of people like Jesse Helms, he continues to write songs which depict life on the L.A. gang scene with startling truth. Ice-T and his band promise a hard rocking and explosive show.

'World' thrives on screen

By AARON NICODEMUS

Nic's Picks

"Saturday Night Live," once the one and only late night comedy show, has found itself hitting hard times. SNL made its name introducing such comedy legends as Dan Aykroyd, Chevy Chase, Bill Murray, Eddie Murphy and Billy Crystal to the world, and in doing so defined the comedy scene. Their skits became embedded into pop culture, from the Coneheads to Buckwheat. Yet for a few years, it appeared SNL was losing its focus, its talent and its audience. Something had to draw the viewers back.

Enter the new blood, complete with two heavy-metal teenagers, Wayne and Garth, filming the irresistible "Wayne's World" from their basement on a public access channel. Wayne (Mike Myers) is the confident leader of the show and his antics lead the show's often warped pace. His best friend Garth (Dana Carvey) is a shy follower who sheepishly answers Wayne's call to "party on, Garth."

Paramount Pictures transformed "Wayne's World" from a five-minute TV spot into a full blown movie. Two things could happen. The charm and personality of the original "Wayne's World" could be amusingly recaptured, or the film could be a painfully overblown version of the SNL classic.

The antics of "Wayne's World" are impish and childlike, but somehow they make us laugh. Wayne and Garth are media burnouts who have amassed all their knowledge, it seems, through popular culture. Their specialties are heavy metal, babes and old jokes, in that order. Behind their facade of teen ignorance, Wayne and Garth play to the camera with a unique style. They own this film, and they know it. Unlike Bill and Ted, these two actually have brains and are willing to use them.

Wayne opens the film admitting that he still lives with his parents, and, of course, Garth is nothing more than a computer geek pretending to be a hard rocker. Despite these uncool traits, their "Wayne's World" show has caught on with Chicago teens. The wealthy owner of Chicago's largest arcade chain decides to sponsor "Wayne's World" and bring it to a major network. Rob Lowe plays the yuppie manager who looks to exploit the pair for his own gain.

Wayne and Garth are soon faced with a moral dilemma: do they compromise their artistic freedom for big bucks? Do they allow themselves to become corporate puppets? Do they ever get their show back? Does any of it matter, unless Wayne can win the woman of his dreams?

"Wayne's World" traces through a purposefully weak plot, and never once takes itself too seriously. Myers and Carvey somehow keep their audience grinning, without really building to a big comic flourish. They are lovable hippies at heart, and "Wayne's World" is a funny trip to take.

FAST FORWARD: Much mired in the genre of evil clowns (Homey on "In Living Color" and Krusty on "The Simpsons"), Bob Goldthwait's upcoming "Shakes the Clown" seems to have been done before. He plays an alcoholic clown who hates kids and harasses their mothers, but will the film provide a new twist? Tim Kazurinsky and Julie Brown also star in this silly tale. Clowns around the world are outraged.

Coming soon is "Memoirs of an Invisible Man," starring Chevy Chase and Daryl Hannah. Chevy gets his molecules reversed in a nuclear accident, and soon everyone from the CIA to beautiful women (Hannah) literally want his body. It couldn't be any worse than Bill Cosby's "Ghost Dad."

REWIND: February is dead time for the video market, possibly time to rediscover an old classic or watch an old favorite again. Some truly bad films are out now, like "Don't Tell Mom the Babysitter's Dead" starring Christina Applegate ("Married With Children"). Another bomb released this week is "Harley Davidson and the Marlboro Man," with Mickey Rourke and Don Johnson as two leather-clad buddies who fight against the mob. Rourke is known for being in great flicks that bust at the box office, but this one deserves its lousy showing.

CLIPS: As part of the "I'm Free for the Weekend" program on campus this weekend, there will be a movie marathon in Stanford Hall, beginning at 11 a.m. and lasting until 6 p.m.

Soundtracks show power

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

ROCK QUARRY

Wayne and Garth maybe goofy prepubescent high school kids, but they do know about one thing ... how to rock. They know about metal and that is simply what they serve on the soundtrack to their new movie, "Wayne's World."

A 13-track compilation features both classic and new music as well. Old standard jammers "Bohemian Rhapsody" by Queen, "Foxy Lady" by Jimi Hendrix and "Dream Weaver" by Gary Wright remain in tact. However, they can only be appreciated Wayne's World style when seeing the movie. The scenes in which these songs are used are as momentous as the recordings themselves.

Cinderella tees off with "Hot and Bothered" but losses heat in a half-baked throw away. The BulletBoys join 'em by taking the traditional route with their cover of Montrose's "Rock Candy." This could have been something special instead of something o.k. This is surprising as producer Ted Templemen, who produced the original, lets this occur.

"Time Machine" sees a reformed Black Sabbath fronted once again by Ronnie James Dio (the first replacement for Ozzy) that falls flat. An AC/DC extraction, Rhino Bucket comes about with "Ride Yourself." Their hooks are irresistible letting them pass without a scratch. This goes ditto for the Red Hot Chili Peppers who pop up with "Sikamikanico."

Eric Clapton comes in with a fine but surprising cameo on "Loving Your Lovin'." Here ol' Slowhand strengthens his blues roots once again by adding a bit of volume rock-n-roll style.

Templemen's new discovery and Wayne's movie girlfriend, Tia Carrere, stands out on her covers of Dwight Yoakam's "Why Do You Want To Break My Heart?" and Sweet's "Ballroom Blitz." She is a predominent figure in the movie with her band Crucial Threat so her performances are enriched in that respect.

The enviable "Wayne's World Theme" is appropriate but drawn out in an extended version that finds Mike Myers (Wayne) and Dana Carvey (Garth) stretching it by shouting out various phrases from their SNL characters. But its forgivable due to their loveable personas ... Yeeeeaaah Riiiiight!

"Falling From Grace" marks John Mellencamp's debut as an actor and a director of a major motion picture. Its soundtrack is not another Mellencamp record but rather a well-furbished country rock compilation that highlights harmonies and acoustic rhythms.

Despite contrary beliefs Mellencamp does perform but not in his traditional context. The irony is his two numbers, "It Don't Scare Me None" and "Nothing's For Free" were not written by himself but by his ex-guitarist Larry Crane who also wrote two others performing one, "Whiskey Burnin'." Here Crane proves he can stand on his own without getting trapped in Mellencamp's shadow.

Violinist Lisa Germano from Mellen's camp takes two solo bows on her instrumentals "Bud's Theme" and "Little Children." But perhaps one of the most interesting combinations concocted here is the Buzzin' Cousins: Mellencamp with Dwight Yoakam, John Prine, Joe Ely and James McMurtry as they perform the Mellencamp penned, "Sweet Suzanne."

Prine, Yoakam, Nanci Griffith, Larry Rollins, Janis Ian and groups Pure Jam and OKUMBRZ add to the diversity created here with their various contributions. Dialogue from the movie laces the whole project together creating a more emotional effect upon the lyrics and the intent left behind them. It proves that point that life is best when kept simplistic and most of all honest.

SPECIAL REPORT*: Motley Crue lead singer Vince Neil has been kicked out of the band by the remaining members, Nikki Sixx, Mick Mars and Tommy Lee. Their reasoning? "He is dedicating too much time to race car driving and does not share our interest for making music," said Sixx in a press conference. The band will seek for a new lead singer immediately.

In a related story, guitarist C.C. Deville has been kicked out of Poison for his dramatic drug problem that acted as a hamper to the rest of the band.

Living Colour bassist Muzz Skillings has left the band do to musical differences.

Plus, Cinderella drummer Fred Coury has left the band for reason's unknown.

PEBBLES: Lollapalooza, last summer's progressive musical/political festival, will return this summer. It will feature the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Jesus and Mary Chain along with several other progressive bands. The tour will hit all the major cities ... Spinal Tap returns March 17 with Break Like the Wind.

Dream Kitchen thrives on its anonymity

By THOM ARNO
Staff Reporter

Humor and beer. These are two major themes of the Dream Kitchen's self-titled, self-funded debut. Moderate success on college radio from California to New Hampshire has allowed the Maryland-based foursome to spread its fledgling wings regionally, with hopes of conquering the globe.

What the disc does is showcase the band's diverse roots. Whether it is the Spanish-tinged "Met Her at the Bullfight," the drippy, Crowded-House-ish "More Than A Woman," or the twangy "Mr. Cellophane," Dream Kitchen seems intent on not falling back on any particular musical genre.

One of the more memorable tracks is "Captain Mellow." With its bluesy chorus, "Captain Mellow has the cure for everyone" could easily be heard dribbling from some scraggy youth's mouth leaving Erin Pub or chanted from the third row of the Tower Theater. "Ultimate Love" may be the song Lloyd Cole wishes he wrote. It sighs: " . . . away away, my liver away, I drank my liver away." Fortunately, in comes the feminine hero ("away away, her liver away, she gave her liver away") and all is mended. Singer Jerry "the Frog" Hergenreder adds: "Just one kiss ended my jaundice." Pleasant.

Regardless, the disc really does not possess any outstanding tracks, which is not a bad thing. It all falls back on a principle of continuity, or even flow. The best thing for you to do would be to put on the disc and then go and do something else, like vacuum or Abdominize. This way, the music won't be right there, looking for judgment. Play it while driving or reading. This allows for maximum enjoyment of a new band that deserves it.

Speaking of Dream Kitchen, in their debut shows they will either reap the treats from a successful run through college campuses, or will lament over fame-unrequited at weekly 12-step programs.

stays tried and true to their roots. That's just me, my personal preference."

V: How about on collaborative writing efforts?

H: "Yeah, we do those tunes too. Although we should be considered looser, we are exactly tighter. Their is no time in this business to screw around. If I know what I want, I'll fight for it 'till I die."

V: To many bands today, the music is secondary. With MTV and magazines looks have become all so important. How do you deal with that element?

H: "I don't really care particularly . . . they are foolish people. Let them sit around worrying about their hair cuts while we make music."

V: How do you see the Horsemen growing in the future?

H: "Most bands as they mature, get bigger and add on things were as we are going to get simpler. Keep things to a bare minimum . . . but still rockin."

V: In the midst of a recession, do you find ticket sales harsh especially for a new band like yourselves?

H: "We've been selling out almost every night. We only charge people four dollars a ticket and we have a good time. There's a recession going on doesn't means rock-n-roll has to stop. Plus, earlier we toured with the Black Crowes, Joan Jett and Lynyrd Skynyrd."

V: Do you ever feel like your backs against the wall?

H: "Sure. I think the whole music industry's back is against the wall. Only the fighters will win. This is why we are still fighting. Six months ago we were there, three months ago we were there and we are still here. Kids are seeing that we are still around releasing good songs and where are the other bands? In the dirt."

V: People can't sell albums any more.

H: "People don't do anything anymore. They don't believe in rock-n-roll anymore. They don't understand the concept of putting a microphone under something, making a noise and then releasing it."

V: Your album title says it all. Does it basically suggest the hard way up?

H: "Yeah. Basically that's the only way to learn anything in life, that's worth anything. If you're wealthy and your dad buys you a new guitar every week you're not going to appreciate it as much as the kid who delivered papers every week to buy a crappy guitar in the pawn shop. That guy will work harder. We all paid our dues. This way people realize you are real and they take you for what you are."

UNCED conference nears

By SCOTT FRIESE
Staff Reporter

As the world makes its way to June 1992 and the highly anticipated U.N.'s Earth Summit, many are tensely holding their breaths waiting to see how the Bush administration will act with respect to the most important environmental activity since Earth Day 1970.

The United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) will take place this spring with representatives from all over the world convening in Rio de Janiero during the month of June.

Why is an Earth Summit of this magnitude necessary? A host of issues will be discussed, ranging from forest use, land and agricultural development, atmospheric issues, the future of the oceans, toxic chemicals, hazardous wastes and environmental education.

Efforts are wasted, however, if the nations of the world do not act as a unified group committed to cleaning the world. Specifically, the Earth Summit will concentrate on three specific ideas:

1. The Earth Charter will envelop basic principles which must govern the economic and environment behavior of peoples and nations to ensure a protection ot our common future.

2. Agenda 21, a master formula for action in all areas affecting the relationship between the environment and the economy.

3. Agreements on bio-diversity climate change that will allow access to not only superpowers but the developing nations of the world, as well.

A noticeable trend may be seen developing between the well-being of the planet and its economic make-up. In other words, those with a greater share in the economic conditions must also shoulder a greater burden of caring for the world.

"Sustainable Development," therefore, relies on nations like the United States to meet the growth of underdeveloped countries so that they may continue developing within an environmentally sound context. Without unified action and assistance between the nations of the world, the environmental problems that plague the world cannot be tackled efficiently on a global level.

Of course, the United States must be at the forefront of this assistance for a variety of reasons. In the case of global warming and the state of the atmosphere, the United States operates the world's largest economy in the world and as such emit the greatest amount of carbon dioxide in the world.

Because of the disproportionate percentage of harmful gases it generates, the United States must initiate reform as a means to set an example for wary and uncommitted developing nations. Many developing nations have, incidentally, openly expressed skepticism over the global warming threat.

The United States entered the latest round of meetings with Japan and many European nations Feb. 17 leading up to June's Earth Summit. Though John Sununu (the former Chief of Staff and enemy of environmental reform) has left the White House, the country is still uncommitted to environmental reform.

The importance of this latest U.N.-sponsored meeting on global warming cannot be underestimated when it ends on Feb. 28, many experts feel it is imperative that negotiators ink an agreement if any breakthrough treaties are to be signed in June.

This summer Megan O'Donnell of V.E.G. will be attending the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development with the Philadelphia Inquirer. She will be bringing back information for the University to provide additional courses on the environment. [See related Story]

Cuomo to decide fate of James Bay

By MEGAN O'DONNELL
Senior Reporter

Within the next year, New York Governor Mario Cuomo must decide the fate of James Bay and Hudson Bay. New York is considering contracting a 20-year, $19.5 billion project with Hydro-Quebec, a utility owned by the province of Quebec. If the plan goes through, 10 to 12 percent of New York's power will come soaring down high-voltage lines throughout the state. The question becomes, "What will this cost?"

The proposed project involves serious consequences and compromises, none of which must be asked of New York. Hydro-Quebec is planning to erect 36 massive dams to harness the kinetic energy of 20 wild rivers. The effects of the damming will redefine an entire region the size of France. But this is not some desolate, barren, unyielding land; rather, it is one of a great many eco-systems including human life.

Hydro-Quebec is planning to erect 36 massive dams to harness the kinetic energy of 20 wild rivers.

The proposed area of flooding includes the regions east of James Bay and southeast of the Hudson Bay. It contains great forests and lakes, bogs and kettle ponds. After harsh winters the spring brings new life to the area: it is home to herds of thousands of caribou and millions of migratory birds and coastal shrimp. It is also the land of the Cree Indians.

The Crees are resisting the project out of great concern for preserving the region as well as traditional Indian ways of life. If the final two stages of the plan are allowed to be completed, an area the size of the state of New Jersey will be underwater, completely flooded.

The first phase of the project, which grew south of the Whale River Basin, required phenomenal sums of landfill and rerouted one of the deepest regional rivers by way of direction and destination. When phase one was complete, the Caniapiscau River was diverted from its northeast flow into Ungava Bay to a western flow into James Bay. In 1984, this massive alteration of nature by modern technology killed 10,000 migratory caribou: they drowned in its raging waters. Of course, Hydro-Quebec claims torrential rains caused the overflooding.

There is concern over the cost and source of energy, yet little concern is expended on what it took to get here.

In the second and third phases of the project, Hydro-Quebec would divert an additional two rivers into the Broadback River. While the two diverted rivers would be transformed into dry bedrock, the water generated from the diversion would be stored in seven reservoirs and sent through 11 powerhouses. From these efforts, approximataely, 35,000 megawatts of power would be avaiable for export.

Hydro-Quebec stresses the fact that only 1.5 percent of the dry land in James Bay will be underwater, but this still amounts to an area the size of New Jersey and does not include lakes and ponds swallowed up by new reservoirs. Ironically, while all the concern seems to be about flooding, the project's many diversions would also turn hundreds of miles of roaring riverways into dry riverbeds.

New York, along with all industrialized areas of the United States, opted for fossil-fuel pollution in the name of progress. Now, when the state cannot comply with the Federal Clean Air Act, are they to be delivered all the energy they desire with no consequences at all? There is a great deal of concern over the cost and source of energy, yet very little concern is expended on how that energy appears and what it took to get here. The next time you fall asleep with your lights on or your radio, remember a scene of rivers that once existed and organisms that could count on those rivers for life itself.

Future greets new urban ecology

By JEANNINE SMOLINSKY
Assistant Reporter

Have you ever dreamed of living in a perfect world? Well, if you have, here is some news for you. Recently, activists from all over the country have come up with a great, new idea called urban ecology. The many activists, composed of architects, planners, landscape designers, community organizers and neighborhood activists, are creating the basis for cities to become healthier and more livable. At the first International Eco-city Conference in Berkeley, Calif. in February 1990, over 700 people showed their interest and concern for helping to make the dream of living in a better world come true.

Cities have become major areas of destruction and pollution. Too many cities exist and, if they are left alone, their harmful effects will end up destroying the rest of the world. It seems as if concrete, stone, metals, plastic and synthetic materials have dominated our planet. Environmentalists cannot simply sit still any longer.

One of the up-and-coming actions that will be taken soon deals with the problem of transportation. Architects and urban planners are planning to build homes, shops and offices close together to avoid the need for transport.

The need for trees seems to be a big issue as well. People feel trees add beauty and shade to the cities and, of course, cleaner air. "In places without trees, you feel an absence affecting people's lives," said Morgan Grove, director of the Yale University Urban Resources Initiative, a project set up to work with inner-city youth in Baltimore, New Haven and Detroit, to create gardens and restore parks.

Actually, in some areas the Eco-city movement is already becoming a reality. In Berkeley, activists are restoring an urban creek long buried in an underground culvert. In Baltimore, kids can recycle a few cans as a payment to go to the city zoo. In Boulder, people can ride the bus for free if they promise they will not drive their car that day.

Does this sound promising? It is possible to change old ways. So go out there and make a difference — ride the bus for free or recycle a few cans. Help our planet Earth.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Nnenna Lynch

This week's Villanovan Athlete of the Week is women's track star Nnenna Lynch. The junior captured the 1000-meter event at the Cyclone Invitational at Iowa State in 2 minutes, 48.99 seconds, a personal best. She defeated the runner-up from South Dakota by more than seven seconds.

It is just another rung on the ladder for Lynch, who will compete in the Olympic Trials over the summer. The runner was one of five Cats who qualified for the NCAA's come March.

Runners crack Top 10

By LARRY LANZA
Staff Reporter

A rematch at the NCAA Championships in Indianapolis was set up last weekend when the 4x800-meter relay of the Villanova men's track team finished second to Arkansas while automatically qualifying for the NCAA Championships.

Running in the Feb. 15 Cyclone Invitational at the University of Iowa, the Wildcats pulled out a 7-minute-20-seconds two-mile relay time to finish less than a second behind the Razorbacks and, more importantly, secure a bid to the NCAA finals next month at the Hoosier Dome.

Junior anchorman Brad Sumner brought Villanova to its fast finish with an outstanding 1:48 final leg, while two other Wildcats recorded sub-1:50 legs of their own.

On the leadoff leg, sophomore Michael Going steered 'Nova through the early traffic with a 1:52 split before handing off to freshman Louie Quintana. Quintana then set off on his first sub-1:50 half-mile ever, coming through in 1:49.9.

On the third leg, senior Finn Kelly hit another 1:49 for the Cats to set up Sumner's fast finish and the close second to Arkansas.

"The two-mile relay was tremendous," said Head Coach Marty Stern. "They ran with heart, enthusiasm and used their talents well. It was a true, old-fashioned Villanova performance."

This standout performance by the Wildcats now establishes expectations for a showdown at the NCAAs where the Cats will get another shot at an Arkansas team that defeated Georgetown and Villanova last year to take the NCAA 4x800 title.

> They ran with heart, enthusiasm and used their talents well. It was a true old-fashioned Villanova performance.
> Head Coach Marty Stern

Sumner and Kelly were both members of the Wildcat relay that finished third at last year's NCAAs. In 1990, Sumner was a member of the Wildcat relay which defeated Arkansas for the title. This year, 'Nova will enter the NCAAs having finished in the top three in the 4x800-meters in each of the past four years, including titles in two of those seasons.

In addition to the 4x800-meters, several Wildcats ran excellent individual performances at Iowa. Junior sprinter Salaam Gariba broke his own school record when he placed third in the 200-meter, a half-second behind winner Chris Nelloms of Ohio State. Gariba's time of 21.12 provisionally qualified him for the NCAA Championship. Gariba has already qualified for the NCAAs in the 60-meter.

"Salaam ran a great 200-meter race in breaking the school record, and we're very proud of him," said Stern.

Due in large part to the strong performances of both Gariba and the 4x800-meter relay team this season, a recent NCAA Top 10 ranking placed the Wildcats ninth. The two-time defending champion Razorbacks topped the list, while Florida, Washington State, L.S.U. and Clemson rounded out the top five.

Besides Gariba and the two-mile relay, 'Nova also ran three freshmen at Iowa: Chuck Silvester, 15th in the 400-meter (48.90); Ken Nason, third in the 800-meter (1:51); and Kyle Watson, fifth in the mile (4:11). Watson and Silvester also teamed up with Brad Sumner and Finn Kelly to finish 20th in the 4x400-meter relay (3:24).

"This was another great performance with many personal records," Stern said of the team's weekend efforts. "Our freshmen continue to improve with PRs (personal records) weekly."

This weekend 'Nova travels to Syracuse for the Big East Indoor Track and Field Championships at the Carrier Dome. At the meet, Georgetown will be attempting to defend its 1991 title.

"Giving up only 26 is pretty good," said Perretta. "But with that much time left, you still have to score. I told the kids in the locker room that we have to get our concentration back, execute better and put the ball in the hoop."

Like the first half, the Cats built a sizeable lead only to have B.C. fight back and slice the deficit to 62-60 with 1:24 left in regulation. The Eagles shot 45.5 percent from the field in the second half and Kerry Curran notched 15 points.

"We played 12 very good minutes in the second half," said Perretta. "We really had good shots, but we didn't put it in the basket. We used only a few people who played a lot of minutes. We basically got fatigued."

Down the stretch, the Cats regained their composure and won the game from the free-throw line. Rosemary Magarity hit four free throws and Michele Thornton canned two.

Earlier in the week, the Cats dropped a 79-62 contest to the fourth-place Hoyas.

Despite trailing at the half by only two, 35-33, the Cats were unable to come back against G'town. When trailing at the half, the Cats are 0-11 this season.

Five minutes into the half, the Hoyas seized their first double digit lead at 48-38. 'Nova would cut the lead to six on a Benedix layup with 10 minutes left, but Georgetown's depth and balance was too much for the Cats.

"We didn't react well," said Perretta. "If you're not able to maintain your intensity and your mental concentration, you're going to have big problems."

Thornton and Benedix paced 'Nova with 18 and 13 points, respectively.

In the final home game of the season tomorrow, the Cats will face Seton Hall at 1 p.m. This contest marks the final home game for seniors Eloise Berry, Magarity and Mary Beth Tukis.

Ice Cats overpower Scranton

By RAY GUTOWSKI
Staff Reporter

The Villanova ice hockey team recorded its seventh win of the season as it trounced the lowly Scranton Royals 12-4. Scranton is one of the lesser skilled teams in the ECAC. But, less skilled teams can be dangerous since they are often times taken lightly. Head Coach Pat Ferrill recognized this and echoed it to his team.

"We knew we had to come to the rink ready to play. Scranton is a weaker team, but we could not let up. It was important for us to continue to execute the entire game." said Ferrill.

In this contest, the IceCats jumped to an early three-goal lead in the first period and continued to apply the pressure, adding five goals in the second period and another four in the third.

Pre-game ceremonies were held in honor of Hugh Maginnis, the all-time leading point scorer in Villanova history. Maginnis answered this acclaim by scoring a hat trick (three goals) and registering six assists. His combined totals over two games are an impressive 12 points and should surely make him a top contender for ECAC Player of the Week.

Also scoring a hat trick and adding two assists is the always steady Marc Guertin. In addition, the IceCats received excellent play from John Demers and Tom Dillon, who recently returned from an injury. The two forwards each scored a goal and dished off two assists.

Starting in goal for the IceCats for two periods of play was Brian Ciampitti. Coming in for the last period was Dan Quintillano. Ferrill was impressed with the way both players handled their goaltending duties.

The IceCats have two remaining game left for this season. Both will be on the road next weekend against Wesleyan and Roger Williams. A contest for the league scoring title will take place as Maginnis matches up against R.W.'s Mike Gambardelli. Before Maginnis' onslaught of points in the Scranton game, the two were tied for the league lead.

Coach Ferrill feels that the key in the R.W. game will be to hold the Gambardelli line to as few scoring opportunities as possible with solid forechecking.

"We want to keep the pace fast, move into transition quickly and keep the puck in our offensive zone," says Ferrill.

With two conference wins, the IceCats can move forward in the conference standings and finish in a respectable position.

Vrind

not exactly enamored by the beauty of 'Nova's campus or by the abundance of activities to do here on the weekends. He came to this country for one reason, to improve his basketball skills in a great basketball environment. In fact, the big man had not even seen the campus before arriving in the fall of 1987.

Since then, Vrind has received an outstanding education and has learned much about the game of basketball, besides making many lasting friendships. He remains close with senior guard Greg Woodard and has benefited by playing alongside hard working co-captains Marc Dowdell and Chris Walker.

As the season draws to a close, Vrind still has the attitude of "never say die." He believes that the Cats belong in the NCAA Tournament field of 64 and by closing the campaign with a strong run and an impressive showing in the Big East Tournament, they can make it. When Paul Vrind heads out from Villanova, he is not going to be giving any farewell speeches, but he will leave with an education and with a pleasant five-year experience under his belt.

SPORTS SHORTS

Talley named Coach of the Year

Football Head Coach Andy Talley has been named the winner of the Scotty Whitelaw Award as the NCAA Division I-AA Coach of the Year by the Eastern College Athletic Conference and the Metropolitan New York Football Writers Association.

Talley guided the Cats to a 10-2 record, their second Yankee Conference Championship in three seasons and a berth in the NCAA playoffs. He ranks as the second winningest coach in Villanova football history with a 48-21-1 record since he took over the program in 1985.

Lacrosse returns to action

The men's lacrosse team is looking to build on last season's national success with the help of a good start. The Cats are coming off of a scrimmage victory over Washington College on Feb. 15. They have a scrimmage tomorrow and upcoming games Feb. 29 and March 7, when they will attempt to claw through the competition. The Cats were 8-5 last season.

Men's Week in Review

By JUSTIN KESTNER
Assistant Sports Editor

For the first time all season five Big East teams are ranked in the Top 25. The bad news is that none of them are rated higher than 17th. Georgetown, Seton Hall, B.C. and St. John's continue to surge while UConn, 'Nova and Miami are still sliding.

SYRACUSE

The Orangemen remain in first place despite having lost consecutive games for the first time all season last week. Syracuse first dropped an 86-76 decision to host Seton Hall. The Orange then experienced a rarity, a non-conference loss at home. Notre Dame defeated Syracuse 101-98 to end a Carrier Dome record 20-game winning streak for the Orange. It marked the first time in 504 games under Jim Boeheim that the Orange gave up 100 points. Dave Johnson led Syracuse, ranked 17th, with 31 points.

GEORGETOWN

The Hoyas earned a pair of road victories and are the only Big East team with a winning record away from home (5-1). G'town first knocked off UConn 70-63 as Robert Churchwell scored 19 points and grabbed eight rebounds. Against Miami, Irvin Church had 20 points while Alonzo Mourning was held to only 11 points, his lowest total of the season. Georgetown is now ranked 25th nationally.

ST. JOHN'S

The No. 24 Redmen captured their fourth straight victory, defeating Pitt 84-74 in their only game of the week. Malik Sealy poured in 29 points and collected 10 rebounds. He has scored in double figures in 93 consecutive games and leads the league in scoring. Shawnelle Scott had 15 points and a career-high 15 boards. Chucky Sproling added 16 points and Jason Buchanan contributed 15 points and nine assists.

SETON HALL

The Pirates are red hot and are now tied for third place thanks to their five-game winning streak. The Hall registered their first victory over Syracuse since Feb. 21, 1981, as all five starters scored in double figures. Their next victim was Providence, 85-77, as Terry Dehere scored 27 points. Seton Hall then buried Pitt 82-63. Dehere scored 13 while Arturas Karnishovas and Brian Caver added 12 points each. The No. 22 Pirates will play at Villanova tomorrow.

CONNECTICUT

The No. 21 Huskies lost their only game last week to Georgetown by a score of 70-63, their second home loss in a row. Forward Toraino Walker is expected to be out about three weeks after having surgery performed on his knee. An inside force, Walker's presence has been sorely missed by the Huskies. UConn will host Providence tomorrow.

PITTSBURGH

Pitt suffered an 0-2 week and slipped into sixth place. The Panthers' 84-74 loss to St. John's was only their second defeat at home all year. Against Seton Hall, Pitt missed 22 consecutive shots during a 15-0 Pirate run. For the game, Pitt shot only 36.7 percent, its worst total of the season. Jerry McCullough managed to score 16 points for the Panthers.

BOSTON COLLEGE

The Eagles evened their conference mark at 6-6 after winning only one league contest last season. Their 82-46 massacre of Villanova represented their largest margin of victory ever in a Big East game. Bill Curley had 10 points and 10 reounds and Howard Eisley added nine points, as B.C. was able to rest its starters early in the second half.

PROVIDENCE

Providence split a pair of road games, winning 73-51 at Miami before losing to Seton Hall 85-77. Against the Hurricanes, Dickey Simpkins scored 14 points and pulled down 15 boards as the Friars dominated inside play. Providence has outrebounded its opponent in every Big East game this season and leads the conference with a plus-9.1 rebounding margin. However, the Friars are 0-7 when their opponents score 80 or more points.

MIAMI

The Hurricanes had another 0-2 week, losing home games to Providence (73-51) and Georgetown (75-58). A bright spot has been freshman Ochiel Swaby, who has led the Canes in scoring the last four games. He averaged 14 points last week and was the only Miami player to reach double figures against Providence.

PLAYERS OF THE WEEK

Malik Sealy of St. John's has been named the Big East Player of the Week. The sleak forward scored 29 points and grabbed 10 rebounds to lead the Redmen past Pittsburgh. Sealy leads the conference in scoring (23 p.p.g.) and is third in field goal percentage (46 percent).

Connecticut's Brian Fair has been selected as the Big East Rookie of the Week. The freshman guard had 14 points, four rebounds and four assists against Georgetown. He has scored in double figures in each of the last three games for the Huskies.

Basketball Preview

Seton Hall at Villanova

The Villanova men's basketball team returns home from an embarrassing three-game road trip. The Cats had hoped to go 2-1, and ready for the stretch drive. But an 0-3 showing has all but sealed the post-season fate of the Wildcats. Villanova, after jumping to a 5-1 start in Big East play, has lost six consecutive conference games. Their record stands at 8-13 and have little chance at an NCAA bid. This is a telling time: Have the Cats packed it in and are simply playing out the year at this point? Or will they play for pride and try to gain something positive out of this year?

The Cats will face the Seton Hall Pirates in duPont Pavilion tomorrow. What a difference a month makes. On Jan. 18, the Hall lost to Boston College. They had lost three in a row and were seemingly headed toward mediocrity. On Jan. 18, The Cats were in North Carolina preparing to play the Tar Heels the next day. The Cats had won four straight and were playing the kind of basketball that garnered upper echelon Big East status.

One month later, Seton Hall has bounced back and won its last five games. The Pirates now stand at 16-6, 8-5 in the conference. Head Coach P.J. Carlesimo's club is ready to make a NCAA tournament charge in March. 'Nova, on the other hand, had disappeared. The Cats are 8-13, 5-7 in the conference and headed toward final exams.

Needless to say, this will be a tough one for the Cats. Seton Hall's backcourt has come together since the last meeting between the clubs. Point guard Bryan Caver has steadily matured into one of the conference's feared guards. Two-guard Dehere has bounced back from a minor injury to average over 18 points per game.

The Hall and the Cats play a similar slow down half court possession-type of game. Villanova specializes in a matchup zone defense while Seton Hall focuses on man-to-man pressure defense. For 'Nova to win tomorrow night, they must create on the offensive end of the court. Turnovers and poor shot opportunities have murdered Villanova this season. An aggressive team with its back against the wall, 'Nova must rebound well and shoot well to upset the hottest team in the Big East Conference.

Women's Week in Review

MIAMI

The past week was business as usual for the Hurricanes. They demolished their most recent opponents, Providence and Pittsburgh, to extend their winning streak to 22 games. With a 14-0 Big East record, Miami held strong at the No. 8 spot in the nation. One more win will wrap up the Big East title for the Canes. With two more weeks of league play remaining, the Canes have their eyes on a spot in the NCAA's top five.

CONNECTICUT

As the season nears conclusion, UConn's Rebecca Lobo continues to establish herself as the Big East's premier newcomer. She won the Big East Rookie of the Week title for the sixth time this season as she scored 19 points in a win over Seton Hall and 18 points in a Husky victory over Syracuse. Connecticut has now won eight consecutive games to grab sole possession of second place in the league with an 11-3 record.

PROVIDENCE

A six-game winning streak for the Lady Friars came to an end when they played the league-leading Miami Hurricanes in enemy territory. The game turned out to be an easy win for Miami, who clobbered P.C. 95-69. Although P.C. has been scoring virtually at will this season, the team's defense remains a weak spot. The latest setback dropped the Friars to 10-4 in the Big East.

GEORGETOWN

The Hoyas won a pair over Villanova and St. John's and climbed into a tie for third place in the conference. These wins were a relief for the Hoyas, who had lost three consecutive games entering the week. Behind the consistent offensive prowess of Kris Witfill (16.6 p.p.g.), the Hoyas hope to continue their winning ways and secure a favorable seed in the Big East Tournament.

ST. JOHN'S

The Express may be in fifth place behind Georgetown and Providence, but a five-game spread separates St. John's from these two teams. After three straight losses, the Express' record is 5-9, and the team is fading away into the league's second division.

PITTSBURGH

With a win over Seton Hall and a loss against Miami, the week's 1-1 split moved the Lady Panthers up to 5-9. Pitt's Jonna Huemrich continues to be one of the most versatile players in the Big East. Whether she is shooting (16.8 p.p.g.) or rebounding (8.8 r.p.g.), she is always able to command an opponent's respect.

SETON HALL

The opposition of Connecticut and Pittsburgh proved to be too much for the Lady Pirates, who dropped both games. An unforgiving schedule for the end of the season does not bode well for the Hall. Presently at 4-10, the Pirates must play a pair of road games and face Providence and Georgetown at home.

SYRACUSE

In the clash of the seven-game losing streaks, the Orangewomen emerged triumphant over Boston College. However, S.U. was unable to post back-to-back victories, as it dropped a 68-63 contest against UConn. Syracuse's 4-10 record puts them in an eighth-place tie with Seton Hall.

BOSTON COLLEGE

The Eagles continued their losing streak last week and now have suffered through a month without a win. This losing streak spans nine games, most recently extended by Syracuse and Villanova. Although Sarah Behn is still the league's leading scorer (26.4 p.p.g.) her team has fallen to a dismal record of 2-12.

Junior forward Nikki Benedix is scoring over 16 points per game for the 9-14 Lady Cats. She has started for Head Coach Harry Perretta's squad in all 23 games this season.

Cats rebound, crush Canes 74-50

By ANDY FITZPATRICK
Sports Editor

Having dropped six straight league games, the Wildcats were in desperate need of a victory any way they could get it.

So they played Miami. And won.

For the first time in nearly a month, 'Nova captured a win in the Big East by dominating league doormat Miami 74-50 Feb. 18 at duPont Pavilion. For the first time in a while, 'Nova was on the winning end of the blowout and were able to at least temporarily stop the bleeding caused by its lackluster play of late.

"Defensively, this was a better game for us," said Head Coach Rollie Massimino. "Being in a rut, everything multiplies. But the team worked hard on Monday, [Feb. 17] and has not lost sight of the 'Villanova Way,' playing with pride and commitment."

The team can play as hard as they want but if they cannot shoot well, wins will be hard to come by in the Big East. The Cats have learned this lesson the hard way, having completed a disastrous three-game road trip with a 82-46 loss to Boston College, their worst league loss ever. All three games were microcosms of each other, examples of what happens when a team falls way behind early and cannot find itself offensively.

The perfect tonic for this plague was a home game against the Hurricanes, the only Big East team shooting worse then 'Nova. Senior guard Greg Woodard asserted himself offensively, hitting eight of 14 from the field and four of seven from three-point range to finish with a game-high 25 points and forward Arron Bain hauled down a game-high nine rebounds and made all four of his shots from the field.

"Bain was most impressive both ways tonight," said Massimino. "He really concentrated and played well."

> Defensively, this was a better game for us . . . the team . . . has not lost sight of the 'Villanova way,' playing with pride and commitment.
> Head Coach Rollie Massimino

Defensive intensity, nonexistent for the Cats during the streak, suddenly appeared against Miami. No longer were Cat defenders giving up uncontested jump shots, inside layups or second or third shots. Rather, the Cats were the aggressors, playing emotionally charged defense that limited Miami's shot opportunities. This defense, in turn, led to easy transition baskets that the Cats were able to knock down consistently.

The Cats received inspired play from an unlikely source, seldom-used freshman Ron Wilson. The backup center had 12 points and six rebounds, taking full advantage of his 12 minutes of action. The freshmen saw more time due to an injury to starting forward Marc Dowdell, who sprained his ankle early in the first half and did not return.

On the strength of Woodard's 15 points, the Cats went into halftime with a comfortable 31-18 lead. The 13-point lead would never be threatened by the Canes, who shot a porous 29.3 percent. 'Nova shot 43.4 percent for the game, a misleading statistic considering Lance Miller's zero for nine from the field. Miller, the team's leading scorer, is usually the barometer of the Cats' offensive success.

Are the Cats back on track, gearing for one last surge? Or was the win due more to the ineptness of Miami? Whatever the case, the team is 9-13 overall, 6-7 in the Big East, extremely disappointing for a team with high expectations that included a NCAA tournament bid. But all is not lost. Tomorrow's game with Seton Hall will show whether the Cats have the ability to salvage the season. A win over the Hall would give 'Nova 10 wins with three winnable games remaining, at Miami and Pittsburgh and Providence at home.

The Cats can make all the excuses they want, strength of schedule, bad breaks, shooting woes, but the team must step up another notch to hold any post-season hopes. The team has shown spurts of greatness, but too many times this season, the team has suffered back-breaking lulls. This inconsistency should not happen to such an experienced team (the Cats' starters are juniors and seniors).

With five games left and then the Big East tournament, the Cats have their work cut out for them. But time and again, 'Nova has proven it can hold its own against anyone. Now is the time to start showing it.

Marc Dowdell has been a constant force rebounding the basketball for the 9-13 Cats. An ankle injury, however, leaves Dowdell questionable for tomorrow's game.

Women continue success

The women's track team enjoyed another successful weekend as they competed in Iowa State University's Cyclone Invitational Feb. 14-15. The Wildcats captured first place in one event and saw five runners earn NCAA qualifying times. The strong performance enabled Villanova to move into second place in the latest NCAA Indoor Track and Field rankings.

Villanova's one victory came when junior Nnenna Lynch captured the 1000-meter event. Her time of 2 minutes 48.99 seconds represented a personal best. Lynch won the event easily as she defeated the runner-up from South Dakota by more than seven seconds.

Although the Cats did not win any other events, the team ran some excellent times as five individuals qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships to be held in March.

Junior Cheri Goddard was the sole automatic qualifier for Villanova. Goddard finished second in the mile with a personal best of 4:41.19, less than one second behind winner Karen Glerum of Iowa State. In addition, three other wildcat runners ran NCAA provisional qualifying times in the mile. Kate Fonshell ran a personal best of 4:43.47, good for fifth place; Chris Gentile finished in 10th place with a season-best time of 4:45.85 and Carole Zajac finished 12th with a time of 4:48.4.

Junior Irene Ruopoli rounded out the list of NCAA qualifiers as she ran a season-best of 2:09.11 for the 800-meter event. Ruopoli's time earned her a third-place finish in the race.

Villanova Head Coach Marty Stern was pleased with the team's effort and results over the weekend. "We continue to look great. We have been short on numbers all year, but rich in talent and spirit. We are looking forward to the Big East [Championships] and the NCAA's with great optimism."

Stern has reason to be optimistic as his Wildcats are gaining strength in the national rankings. In the latest NCAA Track and Field Top 10, 'Nova passed Louisiana State University to gain its current ranking. Florida is on top with a point total of 59, 'Nova second with 42 points, and LSU ranked third with 24 points. Rounding out the Top 10 are UNLV, Nebraska, UCLA, Eastern Michigan, North Carolina, Providence, and Arizona.

"Super races were run by Cheri Goddard, Kate Fonshell, Nnenna Lynch and Irene Ruopoli with PR's [personal records], and the rest of the team is rounding into great form," said Stern.

Villanova will travel to Syracuse this weekend to compete in the Big East Indoor Track and Field Championships.

Cats edge B.C. Magarity paves way

With March Madness slowly approaching, the Lady Cats have suddenly caught fire, winning four of their last six contests.

The team went 1-1 this past week and improved their overall record to 9-14, 5-9 in Big East competition. Despite suffering a loss to Georgetown Feb. 12 at duPont Pavilion, the Cats bounced back to defeat the Boston College Eagles on the road Feb. 15.

In their recent Big East matchup at the Silvio O. Conte Forum, the Cats jumped out to a substantial 12-point lead in the second half. 'Nova had to withstand a late Boston College surge down the stretch to ensure the win. One of the keys for 'Nova was its foul shooting. The Cats sank 15 of 16 shots from the charity stripe and hit six straight with less than a minute to play to ice the game, 68-62.

Another key for Head Coach Harry Perretta was the team's scoring balance.

"We had four people reach double figures for us," said Perretta. "I think that's the reason we won the game."

In the first half, the Cats raced out to a 26-17 lead before B.C. called a timeout to regroup. The Eagles then went on a 9-0 run over the final seven minutes to tie the game at halftime, 26-26.

A look at 'Nova's oldest Cat: Paul Vrind

By JASON CARNEY
Staff Reporter

He was one of the few not responsible for Saturday night's record-setting massacre in Boston. This weekend's 82-46 blowout loss to Boston College was tough to bear, but for Paul Vrind things must be more difficult to digest. Vrind, a senior, has seen a great deal in five years at Villanova. Now is his final year, the tall Dutchman has had time to evaluate his stay on the Main Line.

Vrind came to the States as a raw talent, carrying the "kiss of death" label: potential. He was expected to be a strong contributor to the club. Unfortunately, events have not transpired as hoped. Obviously, Vrind would have liked to have seen things progress differently, but he understands that there are players in front of him on the depth chart who have more talent.

However, that fact has not deterred him as evidenced by his hard work in practice and his support for his teammates on the bench. Now that the Cats' season is almost over, with six Big East games remaining, Villanova is all but mathematically eliminated from the NCAA tournament and Vrind may finally get to see some action.

Moreover, as his days at Villanova come to an end, Vrind will wait a while before putting his education to use. He plans to continue playing the game he loves back home in Europe or Puerto Rico. Also, Vrind has another big goal ahead of him, the Olympics. Yes, that is correct — the Olympics. Vrind was a member of the Holland national team which played in the European championships last summer and right now is one of 30 players competing for the final 15 spots and the right to represent his country in Barcelona. He feels his changes are pretty good. Stop for a moment and think. This is a guy who could not play five minutes a game for a Division I program, but in a few months could be jumping center against Patrick Ewing and trying to stop the likes of Michael Jordan and Charles Barkley from taking the ball to the hoop.

Vrind is a very likable person. No wonder he is a favorite with his teammates and the students. There are not many louder ovations heard than when the seven-footer tears off his sweats to enter a game at duPont Pavilion.

Home in Holland during the summer, when not engaging in a game of hoops, Vrind likes to take it easy. He willingly declares "I am not a morning person" and his afternoons are spent mainly at the beach. When making the decision to come to Villanova, Vrind was

Seniors confront job uncertainty

By ELIZABETH BARSZCZEWSKI
Assistant News Editor

There really is no such thing as a "safe career," said Dr. Jim Klingler, professor of Human Resources Management, in a lecture held Feb. 11, concerning the job market and economy in the year 2000. There are certain types of jobs which will be in high demand, said Klingler. Service-related jobs will be very important in the future, as well as any type of career involving high technology, he added. Also, more and more people will be working for companies that are not solely American-owned, Klingler said.

Graduating seniors do have the option of furthering their education once they have earned their degrees. In many fields, continuing one's education and training in a particular career helps to insure that one's skills do not become obsolete, said Klingler.

"A lot of people say that you get to a certain point and then you peak, and you stop learning easily, but engineers should really still be learning even after they graduate, so graduate school is a way to keep learning," said senior electrical engineering major, Michael Monks.

In order to keep their employees' skills from becoming obsolete, many firms are investing much time and money in further educating their workers, Klingler said. In 1989, firms spent $30 billion on training and re-training employees and the rate continues to grow, said Klingler. "We need to stop thinking that education is something that only takes place in school," he added.

Seniors will also face some changes in the structure and organization of the workplace, Klingler said. In the future there will be a greater emphasis on the achievement of an entire group of employees working toward a certain goal as opposed to the achievements of the individual in the workplace, said Klingler. A worker's communication skills and ability to interact with others will also be very important, he added.

There is also a very good chance that graduating seniors will change employers at least once during their careers, Klingler said. In fact, many people change careers entirely or have dual careers, said Klingler.

"When I first came to Villanova, I thought I wanted to be an electrical engineer and that's it, but now I can tell that I really enjoy working with people and I'd eventually like to go into management," said Monks.

A new trend in the job market is entrepreneurship, Klingler said. Many people who are the victims of cutbacks and layoffs have decided to start up their own businesses, said Klingler.

Women's issues discussed

By JEN BORDA

March has been designated nationally as Women's History Month. The University is recognizing Women's History Month through the efforts of the Women's Studies Program and the department of history.

Schools, agencies, organizations and federal and state governments have set aside this month to focus on greater awareness of the history and contributions of women to society.

"Similar to the designation of February as Black History Month, Women's History Month has been established because for many years the contributions, life and work of black people and women in this society have not been adequately recognized or appreciated," said Dr. Barbara Wall, director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

To celebrate Women's History Month at the University, the Women's Studies Program has scheduled activities for the spring semester that focus on "Gender and War," a topic that coincides with a course required for students enrolled in the Women's Studies minor program. The Women's Studies Program also planned the third annual Elizabeth Cady Stanton Research Award Conference to take place March 18.

The Women's Studies Program and the Student Programming Council (SPC) co-sponsored a one-woman performance of the readings of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony March 10.

Other activities planned are a lecture series and a series of Women's Studies Brown Bag Luncheons on "Gender and War." These events include speakers on subjects such as "Nurses' Experiences of the Vietnam War," "Sexuality, Women and War" and "Women in the Bible."

Presidential candidates' campaigns reflect public views of economy

By LARISA EPATKO
News Editor

Two University professors responded to the economic and political effects of the 1992 presidential debates the day after "Super Tuesday" in a forum sponsored by the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Dr. Barbara Wall of the Center said the forum in Bartley Hall March 11 gave University faculty and students a chance to learn the professors' views of the national economy in the presidential campaigns.

"The 1992 election has the potential to be a redefining election," said Dr. Matthew Kerbel of the political science department. "The electorate is in a bad mood that may endure even after the economy comes back [from the recession]."

Dr. Robert DeFina, of the economics department, said the two main themes in the election are Americans' views of its competitiveness in the world market and increasing fairness of political action committees.

"Competition and creating jobs is an ongoing concern, particularly heightened in the 1980s when American production did not look so good," DeFina said.

Two trends suggested that Americans had problems competing in the world market: exports fell and imports increased, remaining at a high level, DeFina added.

Kerbel said the public's view of the recession did not follow the Bush administration's claim that the United States was falling out of the recession.

The Pennsylvania election for senator between Harris Wofford and Richard Thornburgh in November 1991 was an example of the public's call for change, said Kerbel.

"Three weeks before the election, the voters didn't know Wofford's name, and he was 44 points behind Thornburgh," Kerbel added Wofford had one theme of health care throughout his campaign.

"In Louisiana David Duke challenged the establishment and was almost elected governor of Louisiana, which also showed voter dissatisfaction with the state of things," said Kerbel.

On the Republican ticket, Pat Buchanan has no credentials and held no elected office but holds 3 to .7 percent of the vote from voters' doubts of the effectiveness of Bush's policies, Kerbel said.

Buchanan's message of "protectionism" plays on the fear that America is losing its edge in the world economy, Kerbel added.

Former California Gov. Edmund "Jerry" Brown Jr. is running a competitive campaign with the theme of "reform the system," but he likely will not get the nomination, Kerbel said.

President George Bush's strategy is to wait for the economy to improve so voters will forgive him, according to Kerbel. "Waiting for the economy may not be enough. They could be waiting for the Democratic Party to self-destruct, which may be in the process of doing that right now," he said.

On the Democratic ticket, Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton and former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas are the two candidates who will potentially get the nomination, said Kerbel.

Clinton and Tsongas are more conservative than Brown, "whose strategy makes sense if the public is ready for future and long-term correction," Kerbel added.

The candidates are proposing policies to aid particular products or industries in international markets and policies to increase the amount and productivity of resources," said DeFina.

They approached these policies

Student nurses' association hosts University Health Fair

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

The Villanova Chapter of the Student Nurses' Association of Pennsylvania (SNAP) and the College of Nursing sponsored its annual health fair today from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in Connelly Center.

The fair, entitled "Healthy Pursuits," offered several displays and booths containing information about health care and health education, said senior nursing major and Health Fair coordinator Adam Boroughs.

The fair targeted student interest, said senior nursing major and Health Fair coordinator Diane DiBernardi. "We want the Villanova community to reach an optimum level of wellness," said DiBernardi. "Increased awareness is key to achieving this goal," DiBernardi added. "We are targetting the college population because this is where many bad health habits first begin," said Boroughs. "On a college campus, you aren't exposed to much health care information," said senior nursing major and Health Fair co-coordinator Lauri McNeil. "Bringing health related issues to the attention of the student population is vital."

Specific areas represented in the health fair included sports medicine, exercise and fitness. The sports medicine display was co-sponsored by the University sports trainers. Nutrition, oral health, diabetes, breast and testicular cancer, skin cancer and AIDS were also represented in the display booths. The nutrition, diabetes and AIDS booths were sponsored by the University's College of Nursing as were the vision screening, blood pressure screening and immunization booths. Other health related areas represented included cancer prevention, CPR, rabies and car safety.

Local businesses and other health care agencies contributed to this year's health fair, said senior nursing major and Health Care co-coordinator Nancy C. Burns. Local businesses and proprietors sponsored the door prize

MANAMA, Bahrain

Iran and other Persian Gulf nations joined March 8 in criticizing U.S. plans that would dispatch warships to challenge a North Korean freighter that is said to be full of ballistic missiles destined for Iran or Syria.

As Israel urged the United States to block the missile shipment, U.S. military officials insisted any action would be legitimate in light of the U.N. trade blockade on Iraq.

The United States did agree on March 7 that although the United States is empowered to intercept shipping that may be destined for Iraq, it would not necessarily be able to divert a ship bound for Iran or Syria.

BAKU, Azerbaijan

Armenians and Azerbaijanis continued in a third day of battling March 8 for a town in the disputed section of Nagorno-Karabakh. Dozens of people were reported killed and injured.

Both former Soviet republics charged that troops controlled by the Commonwealth of Independent States helped the other side. These accusations were denied repeatedly by the Defense Ministry in Moscow.

The two republics have been fighting since 1988 over Nagorno-Karabakh, an area inside Muslim Azerbaijan populated mostly by Christian Armenians. Fighting intensified after the breakup of the Soviet Union and grew worse recently, with both sides making unconfirmed claims of hundreds of deaths.

SEOUL, South Korea

U.S. intelligence compiled reports in the 1970s that Americans captured in the Vietnam War might have been sent to North Korea, according to government sources and a CIA document.

The reports were taken so seriously that U.S. officials from Seoul and Washington met secretly in 1975 shortly after the war ended to plan a prisoner release through North Korea, said a reliable source who attended the talks.

President Bush has made POW-MIA issues one of the subjects to be resolved before better relations can be formed with either Vietnam or North Korea. Vietnam has repeatedly denied that prisoners from the Vietnam War were moved to any other nation.

Long ago, however, sources said that Washington had considered the movement of U.S. prisoners from Vietnam and kept classified reports of suspected sightings of Americans in North Korea.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn.

Vandals overturned and smashed 68 gravestones March 8 at St. Peter's Episcopal Church, one of Philadelphia's most historic sites.

Members of the 230-year-old church, where George Washington worshipped and Benedict Arnold was married, walked the walled yard throughout the day, charting the damage and searching for answers to what one said was the most senseless act of vandalism she had ever seen.

The church was built between 1758 and 1761 on a site that was once a duck pond and was donated by Thomas and Richard Penn, sons of William Penn. During the winter of 1781 and 1782, George Washington and his wife Martha worshipped there, often sitting with their friend, Samuel Powell, then the mayor of Philadelphia.

Villanova students live in Rosemont dormitories

By LARISA EPATKO

Residence Life offers an alternative to female Villanova students who did not make the cutoff number in the housing lottery.

Rosemont College's Connelly Hall housed University women this year with positive results, said Daniel Remley, assistant director of Residence Life for Housing Services.

Remley said he suggests to students who are on the waiting list and want to live on campus to create a backup plan. They may sign a contract to live at Rosemont but can move onto the University's campus as rooms are available.

Students who move off-campus when they are on the waiting list are involved with leases and may lose their deposits on houses if they return to live on campus, Remley said.

"One of the advantages of living at Rosemont is that the whole dorm is Villanova students," said Christina Clark, a general arts junior and resident of Connelly Hall.

"We also have the opportunity to meet students from Rosemont. I had stereotyped them before, but the ones I met were nice," Clark said.

All University rules and regulations apply to Connelly Hall, according to Rosemont housing information. Public Safety provides a night security officer from 11 p.m. to 6 a.m.

"The benefits include a flexible meal plan," said Remley. Students can choose from purchasing no meal plan, buying a normal 20, 14 or 10-meal plan or paying $100 for a 20-meal plan where they only pay for the meals they eat, he added.

Some restaurants, like Pizza Hut and Dominos, will not deliver food to Rosemont, Kristie Jiggetts, a junior political science major and Rosemont resident, said. "Once I went to Villanova to order pizza and brought it back here."

> One of the advantages... is that the whole dorm is Villanova students.
> Christina Clark

"Anyone at Connelly Hall can have a car," Remley said. Students can park at Rosemont for free but must have a Main Lot sticker to park on Villanova's campus. "Transportation is also provided via Public Safety," Remley added.

"Living here is inconvenient if you don't have a car," Clark said. "If you miss the shuttle, you have to walk or find someone who can give you a ride," she added.

The van shuttles students every hour between Villanova and Rosemont until midnight. "If you call [Public Safety] they'll come get you" after midnight, Jiggetts said.

"When I see my friends, I usually go visit them so they don't have to come here. If the weather's good, I'll walk ... it takes about 10 minutes," said sophomore communications major Karen Kodumal, a Connelly Hall resident.

Remley will schedule an open house for people to visit Connelly Hall, meet the residents and understand the design and layout, he said.

The 1991-92 academic year was the first Rosemont and the University joined in housing, and Remley said they filled the residence hall with interested students. It is arranged on a first-come, first-serve basis, he added.

"If students stay their entire junior year, they are guaranteed housing [at the University] their senior year," said Remley. If they get on-campus housing from the waiting list, they lose the guarantee.

The rooms have combination locks, sinks, overhead lights and pull shades in replace of curtains. Connelly Hall has three washers and three dryers, hall phones and a kitchen with an oven, stove and microwave.

The rooms provide each occupant with a standard twin bed, closet, dresser, desk with bookshelf and desk chair. There is no air conditioning or cable television available in the rooms.

Connelly Hall residents will continue to receive their mail in Kennedy Hall.

"Last year I lived at home. Living here is a lot better because I can see my friends more than just during the day," Kodumal said.

Habitat workers build volunteer student site

By JANET KEMPLE
Staff Reporter

Forty-four Villanova students and several adult volunteers participated in Habitat for Humanity's spring break trip to Circleville, W. Va., from Feb. 29 to March 7.

The group worked under the leadership of Noreen Cameron of Campus Ministry and three student coordinators. The West Virginia base of Habitat, known as "Almost Heaven," was home to the volunteers for the week.

The main project for the week was the construction of a 20 by 80 foot volunteer center, which would enable future Habitat workers to remain at the site for longer periods of time. The volunteers resided in one large room of a local community center.

In past years, other Habitat groups have traveled to "Almost Heaven" to do repair work on homes in the area.

Located in Pendleton County, Circleville subsists mainly on coal mining but has been flooded in recent years. The county is one of the poorest in the nation.

Approximately 35 percent of households lack central heating. There are few roads and stores, and communities are scarce.

Sophomores Karen Campbell and Cindy Eggert said the week was "a wonderful experience."

"Some people think of this as a sacrifice, because we're not going to Cancun, but it's not like that at all ... I've made so many new friends," said Campbell.

Habitat for Humanity is an international organization headquartered in Americus, Ga. It is a grass-roots movement which strives to provide decent housing for low-income families.

Most of the building materials are donated and construction is done by the volunteers in conjunction with housing recipients.

The Villanova chapter, located in the Campus Ministry office, offers several trips each year and works within the Philadelphia area.

Freshmen qualify for speech finals

By LARISA EPATKO
News Editor

Two University freshmen competed in college speech tournaments and were invited to the National Forensic Association Collegiate Finals at Mankato State University in Minnesota over Easter Break.

Anthony Palladino and Joseph Shearer placed in prose and poetry interpretations, with Palladino taking first place in the Pennsylvania State Speech Finals.

"They have done extremely well for freshmen ... Forensics is extremely competitive at this level," said John Giafaglione, coach of the Villanova University Speech Society.

About 20 other schools competed in the tournaments at LaSalle, Wilkes and George Mason universities, Giafaglione said.

Palladino presented an excerpt from The Red Pony by John Steinbeck for his first place in prose interpretation at Wilkes and second place at LaSalle.

"It was about the tragic loss of a young boy named Jody and the bittersweet fulfillment of that loss," said Palladino, an honors major.

In prose interpretation, the speaker reads about a minute of the text to establish the conflict, followed by a half-minute introduction about how the story relates to people's lives, Palladino said. Then, the speaker finishes the excerpt in the remaining eight minutes, he added.

Shearer won second place in the prose interpretation at George Mason with a piece from the Odessay File by Frederick Forsythe entitled the "Diary of Soloman Tauber."

The speech society competes in meets throughout the year. A speaker presents the same piece at every competition, Palladino said. "The more practice you have, the better you become," he said.

Palladino won first place for his poetry interpretation of "Evidence" by Robert Pollito in the Wilkes and George Mason tournaments and the state finals.

The 1990 poem entitled "Praise for Death" by Donald Hall was the topic of Shearer's poetry interpretation. He received fourth place at the George Mason tournament.

"I took speech for four years in high school and developed a style with more serious material," Shearer said. "I do comedy every once in a while, but it's kind of a stretch for me."

Palladino and Shearer competed in forensics at the high school level. They restarted the Villanova University Speech Society after nine years of its absence, said Giafaglione.

Giafaglione, a 1983 Villanova graduate, was a member of the speech society while he attended the University.

Palladino said his coach helped him prepare the most. "He improved my emphasis, vocal clarity, gestures, tone and interpretation of the piece."

The University will host two high school and college level tournaments next year. "This

Dean Armenti selected for ACE Fellows Program

University Press Release

Angelo Armenti, Jr., a Wayne, Pa. resident and a long-time educator and administrator at the University, was named an American Council on Education (ACE) Fellow for the 1992-93 academic year.

The ACE Fellows Program, established in 1965, is designed to strengthen leadership in American higher education by identifying and preparing promising faculty and staff members for responsible positions in college and university administration.

Thirty-two Fellows, nominated by the presidents, chancellors or chief academic officers of their institutions, were selected this year in a national competition.

Armenti, a 1963 graduate of Villanova with a bachelor's degree in physics, earned master's and doctoral degrees in physics from Temple University.

In 1972, Armenti joined Villanova's physics department and was chosen department chair in 1977. He was named dean of Villanova's part-time division, University College, in 1981, and director of planning in 1987, positions he currently holds simultaneously. He was a recipient of the Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching in 1978.

Armenti is active in the Commission on Higer Education of the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools (CHE/MSA). He developed a strategic planning option for accreditation self-study and chaired a committee that wrote the outcomes assessment guidelines for accreditation self study.

Armenti currently chairs one of three task forces charged with rewriting the Characteristics of Excellence in Higher Education, the guiding document for all CHE/MSA activities.

Each ACE Fellow is assigned for the year to a college or university president and chief academic officer, either at a host campus or at the home institution, to participate in administrative activities.

Fellows attend three six-day seminars on higher education issues organized by ACE, read extensively in the field, produce an analytical report and engage in other activities to prepare them for leadership positions.

ACE is the umbrella association for the nation's colleges and universities. Its membership includes almost 1,600 degree-granting institutions and more than 200 higher education associations and organizations.

Through voluntary and cooperative action, ACE coordinates national policy positions on higher education issues and provides comprehensive leadership for improving educational standards, policies and procedures.

The ACE Fellows Program is part of the Council's Center for Leadership Development.

Lack of officer training contributes to campus crime

By College Press Service

University of Toledo police found the body of Melissa Anne Herstrum, a 19-year-old nursing student on Jan. 27, face down in the snow, shot 14 times. On Feb. 1, police arrested a university police officer for the murder.

As police continued to release the details of the killing, more allegations against Officer Jeffrey Hodge, 22, have surfaced.

Although Hodge has been charged only with aggravated murder, police suspect the officer in other crimes on campus — three death threats made to female students over the telephone; two bomb threats; nine arsons over the 1991 Labor Day weekend; and a Jan. 20 shooting spree in which six shots were fired from a 9mm pistol into a women's dormitory, barely missing a sleeping student.

While the Toledo case is uncommon, it has raised a basic question of trust — how much students should have in the police officers who are hired to protect them.

According to Roger Serra, president of the International Association of Campus Law Enforcement Administrators and chief of the University of Washington Police Department, the credentials of campus police vary from state to state.

"There are both commissioned and non-commissioned officers," Serra said. "A lot of schools use private security guards because they can't afford a regular police department. In most of the [private security] cases, they have no academy training."

There also is the question of whether campus officers should carry guns at all.

"We should be less like the traditional police department and more like community departments in terms of our response," said Tom Evans, public safety director at Drew University in New Jersey.

"We're still serving as a police organization, but we do it without sworn authority, without weapons. I think it's very effective ... we're interacting with the students so they see us as part of the community, not someone who's judging them."

We're still serving as a police organization, but we do it without sworn authority, without weapons.

Tom Evans, public safety director at Drew University

The lack of training and loyalty has no impact on whether or not security guards can carry guns, Serra said.

Herstrum's parents released a statement following Hodge's arrest asking students to keep their confidence in university police. They "do not want to suggest that the University of Toledo police department is incompetent in any way," a family spokesman, Rev. David Bell, said in a prepared statement.

"They are especially concerned that college students at the university continue to rely on their police department for protection and assistance," Bell said.

Campus police administrators say that is the right message to send, since the Toledo case was unusual. Still, other incidents have occurred.

In 1986, Katherine Hawelka, a 19-year-old Clarkson University student, was raped and killed in view of university security officers. The officers said they believed Hawelka and her attacker were engaged in a playful sexual romp.

In July, 1990, Hunter College student Stuart Wieser, 20, was stabbed and seriously injured by a dormitory security guard after reportedly instigating a petition drive to oust the guard.

Residents of the dorm complained that numerous incidents of sexual assault and abuse as well as thefts had occurred while the guard was on duty. They also told university officials that the guard assaulted two other students in separate incidents two weeks before he stabbed Wieser.

In November, 1990, a Gallaudet University student died at the hands of campus security after they tried to stop an argument between the student and a professor about a grade.

Carl Dupree, a deaf student, refused to leave, so the officers handcuffed him. A struggle ensued during which Dupree collapsed and died of asphyxiation.

The incident prompted students at Gallaudet, a university with a student population that is predominantly deaf or hearing impaired, to call for special sensitivity training of officers, especially proficiency in sign language.

Senate passes legislation for increased financial aid

By College Press Service

The Senate approved a major expansion of student financial aid through the 1990s, but dropped a popular provision that would convert the Pell Grant program into an entitlement.

Senate leaders decided not to bring up the entitlement issue for a vote, fearing that a defeat could ruin prospects for the entire bill. The idea still survives in a House student aid bill, although it also faces opposition because of cost concerns.

Pell Grants would receive automatic funding as an entitlement, thereby avoiding the annual appropriations process that often leaves the program short of its authorized funding level.

Student groups expressed anger with the Senate's vote Feb. 21.

"We are outraged that the Senate did not take this opportunity to give all Americans the ability to obtain a post-secondary education," said Tajel Shah, president of the United States Student Association.

"This sends a message to America's hard-pressed students and families that a post-secondary education is only accessible to those fortunate few with the means to afford skyrocketing tuition," Shah said.

Other student advocates expressed surprise at the news, but acknowledged that budget constraints made it difficult for senators to support the measure. "It's a tough economic and budgetary time," said Michelle Stent, vice president for government relations at the United Negro College Fund.

Should the House approve a Pell Grant entitlement later this year, the issue would go to a House-Senate conference committee for final resolution.

Despite inaction on the entitlement, the bill approved by the Senate would extend programs under the Higher Education Act for another seven years. It would increase the maximum authorized Pell Grant from $3,100 to $3,600 by 1994. The bill proposes annual increases in subsequent years to bring the grants to $4,800 by 1999. Nearly 3.8 million students receive Pell Grants.

Traditionally, actual appropriations have trailed those authorization levels. Current funding permits a maximum Pell Grant of $2,400.

The bill also would broaden access to Pell Grants by making more middle-income families eligible for the program. Income eligibility for a family of four would increase from $30,000 to $42,000.

Elsewhere in higher education, the bill would increase funding for programs to recruit and train future teachers.

and beverage booths in addition to other health care booths, said Burns.

The Department of Public Safety sponsored the campus safety booth and Students Against Drunk Driving (SADD) sponsored the "mocktail" booth. The Infirmary sponsored the display on campus health care and the Corr Counseling Center sponsored displays on suicide prevention, eating disorders and stress mangement. The Center for Drug and Alcohol Assistance sponsored a booth concerned with drugs and alchohol.

The entire senior nursing class, nursing faculty members and outside nurses specializing in specific fields ran the booths, said Burns. "All major nursing student were required to help with the display booths," said Boroughs.

"Health promotion is an important part of nursing practice," said Carol Toussie Weingarten, Ph.D., R.N. "The annual health fair provides a special opportunity tor nursing students and faculty to promote health awareness in the Villanova community," said Weingarner.

Speakers from Swarthmore College, Rutgers University, the University of Illinois and Cambridge University will present the lectures. The department of sociology, the College of Nursing, the department of history and the department of modern languages are co-sponsoring the speakers.

will present the campus to the cream of the crop of high school students," Giafaglione added.

"Forensics gives people, with practice, a better presence and feeling about themselves as they speak," Palladino said.

The speech society had limited resources for budgetary reasons, but the University will start funding travel expenses for weekend competitions, said Giafaglione.

Members of the speech society amount to 13, but Giafaglione said he hopes to increase the number to 20-25 participants.

"There's something for everyone," Giafaglione said, including dramatic interpretations, informative and persuasive speaking, original poetry, impromptu speaking, single and dual drama and stand-up comedy.

Employers consider graduates' skills deficient

By College Press Service

The experts agree that when the job market is tight, it is critical to know your perceived weaknesses and fix them.

According to both the 1992 Northwestern Lindquist-Endicott report and the 1992 Recruiting Trends report from Michigan State University, the biggest deficiencies of recent graduates are:

— Unrealistic job expectations, topped both lists.

According to Recruiting Trends, college students "do not see the big picture ... They lack imagination, especially after graduation. Graduates only want to work 8 to 5. ... They lack loyalty to the company, refuse to have patience, and they expect to start at high wages — they are told to expect this by college faculty."

— Poor communication and writing skills. Ranked second by both reports, the researchers note that recent graduates's skills in these areas are noticeably worse than in years past. Employers specifically say grammar and spelling need improvement.

— Insufficient resumes and interview preparation. Employers say graduates do not bother to research their companies before interviews and they do not exude confidence and assertiveness to successfully "sell" themselves to an employer.

Other shortcomings included a lack of practical work-experience through internships or co-op programs and few signs of professionalism.

Career counseling officers nationwide said programs exist to help persistent, committed students overcome their problems.

"There's a tremendous amount of preparation out there," said Leslie Mallow Wendell, director of career services at Widener University. "There are workshops, classes, support groups for students. There's mentoring, where we hook students up with industry mentors through networking. Networking is becoming more important."

Dale Austin, director of career planning and placement at Hope College in Michigan agrees that students have many options.

"The advisable approach is for them to broaden their options. They need to be creative in looking at other alternatives, they need to be creative in their approaches," he said. "Finding a job is more than just job fairs and on-campus interviews."

Austin said that when interviewing, students need to realize that "even if they have strong credentials, the interviewing time is critical time" to allow a prospective employer to get to know a student's personality, goals, enthusiasm and energy.

Harassed students can sue for monetary damages

By College Press Service

Colleges and universities may be taking a second look at sexual harassment policies in light of a recent Supreme Court ruling.

The Feb. 26 ruling cleared the way for sexually harassed students to sue schools for monetary damages under Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, a decision ahiled as "a stunning victory for women" by the National Women's Law Center.

"With this decision, girls and women finally have a powerful weapon to fight sex discrimination in education," said Marcia Greenberger, co-president of the center. "Education institutions will receive the message loud and clear that they have to seriously address the discriminatory policies still too frequently found."

The court ruling likely will force schools to reassess existing policies or write new ones.

"I do think it will cause schools to [review] their policies to make sure they have teeth, and at procedures that will insure that we can do a thorough investigation when we respond to a complaint," said Paul Pitts, affirmative action director at Louisiana State University.

Many schools already have strong programs dealing with sexual harassment, but they need to make sure students know how to file complaints, Pitta said.

"We all have a responsibility to respond to the students, and to let them know the affirmative action office is available for counseling," Pitts said. "If the policies are working, the work and study environment should be as open and free as possible ... the way men and women should interact, in a pleasant environment, not fearful of what we are going to say and do."

Many schools have adopted policies that forbid "unwanted and unsolicited sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other deliberate or repeated communication of a sexual nature, whether spoken, written, physical or pictorial."

With this decision, girls and women finally have a powerful weapon to fight sex discrimination.

Marcia Greenberger, co-president of the National Women's Law Center

The Supreme Court's ruling came in the case of a former high school student from Georgia who sued over her alleged sexual encounters with a teacher.

Although the full implications of the ruling remain unclear, legal experts say the worst thing a university can do is ignore complaints of sexual harassment..

Charlie Shanor, a law professor at Emory University, noted that the ruling fell under Title IX, which bars sexual bias in all educational programs that receive federal funding, including grants, so private as well as public schools would be affected. The ruling basically parallels Title VII, which is the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) regulation against sexual harassment.

Title VII says an employer can be held liable for damages in sexual harassment cases if supervisors request sexual favors of employees in return for something. It also says that employers may be held liable if the sexual harassment involves the creation of a "hostile environment" (sexually explicit comments, nude photographs on a wall, etc.), but in such cases the employer must have had knowledge of the incident and ignored it.

A professor who pressures a student for sex in return for a higher grade might present a clear-cut case of harassment.

If women repeatedly complained about suggestive remarks made by members of an on-campus fraternity and the university ignored the problem, Shanor said he believed the school could be held liable under the court's latest ruling.

Election '92

at different angles, according to DeFina. To ensure a "level of playing field" the government would use "protectionism" to "slap tariffs and taxes on their [foreign] products," he said.

A more preferred angle would be to "use legal remedies to obtain freer trade or get rid of trade barriers," which would create a greater variety of trade, said DeFina.

A third way is for the government to give preferential treatment to industries or products with potential to excel in the world market. The problem is the choice becomes political, DeFina added.

To increase the amount and productivity of resources the government could increase spending on education and retraining the work force to better compete in the world economy, said DeFina.

The government could deregulate businesses, so they would be forced to follow safety codes, he said.

Another approach would be for the government to provide tax incentives for investment so people would invest more, DeFina said, adding that the problem was this approach has little effect on the economy.

Increased spending on public infrastructures, like roads, bridges and schools, was the final approach to increasing the amount and productivity of resources, said DeFina.

Election attracts college volunteers

By College Press Service

Democrats claim that the 1992 presidential election attracted the largest crop of college volunteers in more than a decade. The outpouring of student interest has convinced the candidates that there is a real advantage in exploiting the energy of students. Few candidates can afford high-priced staff members, so the students provide much-needed cheap labor.

In New Hampshire and Maine the students stay in gyms, churches, supporter's homes or on the headquarters' office floor. They lick stamps, stuff envelopes, carry banners, canvas votes door-to-door, answer phones or follow their candidate around and chant his name on cue.

For Jessica Plante of Salve Regina University in Newport, R.I. working for Sen. Bob Kerrey started out as lark and ended up as an avocation.

The creative writing major started out as a headquarters receptionist for a weekend. Now she is a permanent staffer traveling with the campaign.

"This is a good way to learn about behind-the-scenes stuff," Plante said. "It make you politically aware. It's always in your mind."

Plante is pragmatic about Kerrey's third place in the New Hampshire primary. "We just wanted third. We wanted 15 percent, but 12 percent is good enough. Once he gets to South Dakota, he has a lot of support down there."

Plante, who stayed in a supporter's home in New Hampshire, said she had "hardly any interest" in politics before becoming involved in Kerrey's campaign.

"In my age group, there are other things to do. It's boring to sit back and figure out who's running, and so forth. This way, you get it all first hand," said Plante.

College and university officials have been surprised by the student interest in this year's election in view of the general voter malaise.

Some students have responded to a movement powered by Rock the Vote, a national, non-partisan organization founded by the recording industry. Organizers have swarmed across New Hampshire and Maine campuses and have claimed to have registered 10,000 young voters.

At the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard last fall, Kerrey and Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton attracted crowds of nearly 1,000 each.

After the speeches, approximately 100 students signed up to work with each candidate.

During the New Hampshire and Maine primaries, most of the student activity was in the Democratic campaigns. Of the six major candidates, three — Paul Tsongas, Clinton and Kerrey have attracted substantial numbers of younger supporters.

Political experts have a "wait and see" attitude regarding the "youth vote." Only 36 percent of eligible citizens, aged 18 to 24, showed up for the last presidential election. Their turnout rate has dropped in each election since the voting age was lowered in 1971.

The mood among Tsongas' young supporters was "elation," said Michele Bair, an electrical engineering major from Boston University.

Tsongas edged out Clinton in New Hampshire and won the Maine primary after a heated battle with former California Gov. Jerry Brown.

Steven Satran, 26, executive director of the College of Republican National Committee, reports that student interest in his organization has grown dramatically over the past decade.

"We are the largest youth-based and the oldest political organization for young people. This year we celebrate our 100th anniversary."

The Connelly Center Board of Directors

Announces Immediate Openings For Two Student Representatives For Two-Year Terms From June 1, 1992 to May 31, 1994

The Connelly Center Board of Directors is composed of thirteen members. These members represent Villanova faculty, administration, staff, students and alumna/alumnus. The Board develops policies and acts as the guiding force for certain aspects of the Connelly Center. Its purposes and responsibilities are to develop policies and recommend procedures for the use of the facility, conduct programs and aid in evaluating the Connelly Center's overall operations. This is done in a manner consonant with the interest of Villanova and in keeping with policies set forth by the Trustees of Villanova University.

The two vacant positions on the Board are established through a petitioning process. Petitions will be evaluated by the Board's Standing Committee on Nominations. Students may petition for membership on the Connelly Center Board of Directors by obtaining an application in the Connelly Center Administrative Office located behind the Information Desk. Petitions must be returned to this office by Friday, March 20, 1992, for review by the Nominating Committee.

Exercise your voting power

While many Villanovans went away for Spring Break to improve their tans and forget the "rigors" of academics last week, the U.S. presidential campaign heated up and climaxed March 10 with "Super Tuesday," the biggest day for hopeful candidates.

Although incumbent Republican George Bush and Democratic hopeful Bill Clinton solidified positions as leading candidates, the campaigns of conservative Pat Buchanan and moderate Paul Tsongas are still alive. The April 28 Pennsylvania primary is your chance to make a difference.

In a world where the freedom to vote is just now becoming a right in many countries, Americans too often overlook this fundamental democratic activity and choose not to participate in elections. Like many Americans, many Villanovans are apathetic and often ignorant of the issues and problems facing the nation.

Do you know what former Sen. Tsongas' stance is on middle class tax breaks? Do you know why Buchanan entered the election? Do you know who won the Democratic primary in Texas? Do you understand the meaning of President Bush's capital gains tax proposal?

Before April 28, educate yourselves on the policies of each candidate, both Republican and Democrat. Register in your county or register here. The '92 election is too important to overlook.

The country is in a recession and, according to experts, will continue to fall the rest of this year. Over 20 percent of U.S. workers did not have a job in 1991. Many Villanova families have suffered from unemployment and economic strife.

National health care is a major issue. Should it be [illegible]

Watch out for housing pitfalls

[illegible]

First of all, beware of many things. Upperclassmen who have been through this ordeal before could tell you horror stories about leases falling through, bad landlords and poor living conditions.

Do not be afraid to ask for help. Residence Life will help you locate a possible house and also will provide you with information about leases and your rights. Kathy Byrnes, assistant to the dean of Students, is another person who can assist you. She is a skilled lawyer who has had a great deal of experience solving housing problems with students.

Finally, if you are moving off-campus, attend one of the information meetings run by Residence Life. You may find a house or an apartment that you will call "home."

War metaphors reflect hostile campaign tactics

By ELLEN GOODMAN

The crocuses are a-blooming, the Ides of March and the Ides of Super Tuesday are upon us. So, by all these portents, it must be time for my quadrennial plea against the use of sports metaphors in writing, speaking and thinking about politics.

This has been a long, personal and so far entirely futile attempt on my part to have an impact on the rhetoric of democracy. By my calculations, politics has been described as the great American sport ever since the first election was called a race and the candidate became a winner.

In the end, the war metaphor produces a victor or a commander in chief. But not necessarily a governor, or a leader or a problem-solver.

But sports reached a saturation point in the '80s when politicians began to sound like the Wide World of Sports and the media turned from analysis to play-by-play. One favorite mixed sports metaphor came in 1984 from Lawton Chiles, now the governor of Florida, who described the "game plan" for the presidential debates this way: "It's like a football game ... Mondale can't get the ball back with one big play. But the American people love a horse race. I would advise him not to knock Reagan out."

Well, as expected, the 1992 campaign began with the usual assortment of slam-dunks, knock-out punches, end runs and fast-balls. But something happened after the campaign left New Hampshire and relative civility. While I was trying to get out of the locker room, we ended up in the trenches.

The metaphors switched from sports to war. The political coverage reads less like Sports Illustrated than Soldier of Fortune.

We have campaign "assaults" and "attacks." The Super Tuesday states are "battlegrounds." The candidates "snipe" and "take aim" at each other. Jerry Brown is accused off using "slash-and-burn" tactics. Paul Tsongas is "under fire." And Pat Buchanan is a man who will "take no prisoners."

How did this primary get off the playing field and onto the killing field? Kathleen Jamieson, political wordsmith and dean of the University of Pennsylvania's Anneberg School of Communication, says that war images creep in as a campaign gets hostile.

"When you are playing fairly within the rules of the game, the sports metaphors fit. The war metaphor is much more negative. It doesn't assume fair play or a referee."

If words are the way we frame our ideas, the war metaphor is more than rhetoric. It forces us to talk and think about elections as if they were lethally combative events in which the object was to kill the enemy and declare victory. In the end, the war metaphor produces a victor or a commander in chief. But not necessarily a governor, or a leader or a problem-solver.

War talk does not allow the candidates to describe or stand on common ground. "It doesn't assume the goodwill and integrity of the other side," says Jamieson, "It doesn't talk about common good and colletive ends. It assumes one person is right and the other's wrong."

As for the media and the metaphor, fighting words frame the campaign as a search-and-destroy mission. It is not a coincidence that attack ads make the headlines. Nor is it a coincidence, says Jamieson, that men are much more likely to talk like warriors and write like war correspondents.

Jamieson herself has been trying to elaborate a different political campaign language. She first played with a courtship metaphor since the candidates do woo the electorate and pledge forms of fidelity. That was, to put it mildly, frought with sexual undertones.

In New Hampshire, a focus group came up with the metaphor of an orchestra. The government is, after all, a collective entity that needs a leader to keep things in harmony. This had a nice ring, but it didn't hit all the right notes.

Now Jamieson is toying with a metaphor that would picture the campaign as a quest. In the vernacular of the "quest" metaphor, the candidates would overcome "tests" that reveal their "character." The campaign would become a "search" for answers, not for the soft underbelly of an opponent.

The point is to shift the verbal focus from strategy — "Is he doing what's necessary to win?" — to problems — "Does he understand them, can he solve them?" Her own quest for this "quest" metaphor has just begun. Any ideas are welcome in our metaphor mailbag.

In the meantime, in the spirit of peacemaker, may I suggest that candidates and those who cover them, block that war metaphor. Tackle it if you must. There are already enough bodies on the combat field, careers blown to smithereens and land mines planted for the fall election. All we have learned so far this election year is that politics is hell.

What issues on campus need deeper coverage?

I think an important issue which Villanova must deal with is its on-campus housing situation. I feel that the University should have more co-ed housing, not only to encourage more social interaction but to relieve the restrictive visitation policy.

Recognizing the University has made some progressive efforts, the on-campus housing situation needs to be more vigorously pursued, perhaps regarding upperclassmen apartment housing.

Why do voters pick image over substance?

By GARY SUDBOROUGH

One thing that really bothers me about the current trend in politics is the obvious propensity of voters to pick image over substance. For instance, there is the macho image the Republicans have been trying to project. You know, the "Make my day," "Read my lips" stuff. For 10 years I have had to listen to this baloney from Bush and Reagan as if they have a corner on masculinity and anyone with progressive views is a wimp. Of course, it should be very obvious that Bush's pledge of "Read my lips, no new taxes" was an outright lie, but that is not what aggravates me the most.

How many years will it take for people to realize the Republicans do not care about the homeless, the environment, education and the deficit?

Actions speak louder than words, and what actions have these conservative Republicans taken? They cut the school lunch program for poor children, they cut the cost of living adjustments on Social Security for elderly people, they cut disabled people off from their benefits claiming they were faking disabilities and they have consistently vetoed aid for the mentally ill, etc. They pick the weakest, most defenseless segments of society and attack. These are not the actions of macho men, but those of heartless cowards.

Recently, Bush vetoed an unpaid leave of absence bill for workers so they could take time off for things like a sick child, a death in the family and a new baby. Previously, if you will remember, Reagan vetoed a bill giving workers several weeks of notice of a lay-off so they could prepare for it. Their excuse for these vetoes was that it should be left to the discretion of employers to do these things.

How many years will it take for people to realize the Republicans do not care about the homeless, the environment, education, the deficit or any of the other colassal problems facing this nation? They care about big business and the profits of big business. They care about breaking unions, lowering the capital gains tax, keeping the minimum wage low, exploiting the environment and censoring art, music, literature and radical ideas. They have an agenda masquerading as family values, Christian ethics, anti-crime and anti-abortion agenda. They have fooled the majority of the American people too, unfortunately.

They have plenty of your hard earned money for their country-club buddies, but very little for hungry or abused children. They have billions to add further zest to the lifestyles of the rich and famous, but nothing to build shelters for the homeless. They even have taxpayer money for gold plated bathroom fixtures, but very little for the sick, the elderly, the disabled or those with AIDS.

Of course, the infamous "thousand points of light" is supposed to take care of all these people, right? I am sorry, but charity is much too little, much too late. One would think, with Iran-Contra and all these other scandals, that the nation would be furious with the Republicans, but no. It seems if one acts macho, seems sincere, smiles a lot and gives the appearance of being a "nice guy," the public is willing to forgive anything.

Gary Sudborough calls himself a "concerned citizen." The California resident sends his commemtaries to campus papers throughout the country.

To the Editor:

As an ex-cartoonist for the Villanovan (1960-1962), I thought to send this drawing to you [see above] for your use.

As you may know, the Philadelphia area's focus on the Columbus discussion revolves around the renaming of Delaware Avenue to Columbus Boulevard in spite of the insult this represents to Native Americans (the Delaware, specifically).

This cartoon, I hope, could inspire discussions about the involvements of all the elements wading ashore ... [many] of which were connected then and are doing the same thing 500 years later.

Columbus, by the way, probably looked more like my drawing than the usual depiction that looks more like a young George Washington or Charlton Heston. Columbus had a red beard which later grew white.

Arab/Israeli debate continues

By PETER MOLINEAUX

Hypocrisy is found frequently in the most noble of institutions, employed by opinionated individuals in the interests of propagating their own ideology. In the academic environment of this University, such hypocrisy is usually minimal, given the nature of a Liberal Arts education: no insistence on absolute "truths" but instead the maintenance of Roman Catholic orthodoxy at an institution which promotes scholastic debate in a given class format.

Morton A. Klein's continual assault on the University's Center for Arab and Islamic studies and the Center for Peace and Justice (Feb. 21 issue) is sickening in its attempt to propagandize the issue of Israel and the Palestinians. While Klein accuses the University of "crossing the boundary from legitimate debate into outright propaganda," he makes no attempt to approach the subject of Israel objectively. Instead, he insists on subjecting the University to his own brand of Israeli nationalism.

Ironically, Klein demands a "rigorous adherence to certain objective truths." What "objective truths" are these — the history of the Middle East by Morton A. Klein?

For the sake of scholastic debate, we can temporarily entertain Klein's unique perspective on the events unfolding in the Middle East. His first criticism involved the participation of "the well-known Jewish critic of Israel, Michael Lerner" in a forum sponsored by Villanova's Center for Peace and Justice. While Lerner appears to be opposed to the policies of Israel's Likud party, there was little indication that he was anti-Israel. The Center for Peace and Justice has its name for a reason, and it was not to help propagate the bellicose demagoguery of the Israeli far right.

The Peace and Justice position paper that Mr. Klein found objectionable is half right on the issue of "annexed lands." The West Bank and Gaza Strip were only annexed de facto in 1967. The slow, incremental moves to remove Palestinian authority in the territories was designed for an eventual, and inevitable de jure annexation by Israel proper. Most legal scholars agree that international law prohibits a belligerent occupying power from placing "civilian settlements in the occupied regions." The 1987 estimation of 177,500 settlers in the territories (Gerner, 1991) is also not even close to Klein's "only 100,000."

With the conclusion of the Camp David Accords, Klein has said the Palestinians were offered "immediate semi-autonomy with a more permanent resolution later." Does he truly believe that the Palestinians were offered true autonomy by the former Begin government? Granting authority to Palestinians currently inhabiting the biblical lands of Judea and Sumaria is one action any Likud administration would vehemently oppose.

Could someone please tell me where Klein's "yearly massacres of ... 12 million coptic Christians" take place? After living in Egypt, I would be interested in knowing what occurred under my oblivious nose. It also appears that Klein himself needs what he has termed "more training to understand" that the $10 billion in loan guarantees will likely cost the U.S. taxpayer "several hundred million dollars" (The New York Times, Feb. 25.).

Klein's advocacy for democracy and basic human rights in various Arab countries is commendable, and are issues that need to be addressed by the U.S. However, both the International Red Cross and Amnesty International possess well-documented accounts of human rights violations in the occupied territories. The "imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, arbitrary arrest and detention without charge or trial, demolition of houses" and both the "shooting and beating of unarmed individuals" and "the torture of detainees" are just a few of the reported incidences.

The Peace and Justice newsletter offers valid criticism when it states that "true peace in the Middle East will only be a reality with justice for the Palestinians." Perhaps this justice would not prevent regional disputes such as the Iran-Iraq war or "Syria's destruction and takeover of Lebanon." However, Israel continues to be the most destabilizing force in the area. Its invasion of Lebanon resulted in Syria's intervention and led to the deaths of hundreds of Israelis and thousands of Lebanese.

Klein's harsh criticism of the Center for Peace and Justice should not be looked upon by the Villanova community with concern, but with ironic relief. The University administration should be concerned if the Center for Peace and Justice were to sponsor anyone with such a blatantly militaristic position as to be able to avoid Klein's criticism. The opinion of other Jewish Americans differ remarkably from those of Klein. Instead of criticizing all so-called "anti-Israel" forums which may deal with the question of "Peace," most American Jews have supported a process of constructive dialogue.

I have personally become very tired of Mr. Klein's constant barrage of attacks against the University. Villanova should support "an atmosphere for the open discussion of all political perspectives," but not outright rightist propaganda. Morton Klein is beholden to no one but himself, while Villanova tries to insure a more rational approach to Middle Eastern affairs. Let us recognize Klein's position for what it is — the demagoguery of one extremist who even has difficulty listening to his own peers.

Get in shape safely for summer

By MONTA MONACO
Features Editor

Spring is almost here. Warm weather is on the horizon. Spring Break gave students a taste of suntans, a yearning for summer and a horrifying glimpse of themselves in a bathing suit. Cellulite thighs and beer bellies are emphasized now that summer is coming and students are panicked. According to health care experts, there is a right and a wrong way to regain and maintain the perfect physique.

Students tend to put on a few pounds — girls more often than guys — during their college years. Alcohol is often a part of the problem, and students are usually limited to eating what is offered in the dining halls, then snacking on their own.

Studies show that younger dieters are more interested in instant gratification and take the route of diet drinks and pills. However, these methods can often be hazardous to one's health, and the weight tends to quickly reappear, according to Elizabeth Schmitt, program administrator at Chestnut Hill Hospital. Schmitt said that people need to completely revamp their eating habits and form a new routine to lose weight for good.

Cellulite thighs and beer bellies are emphasized now that summer is coming, and students are panicked.

"You can buy a book on how to play the piano but when you sit down, you don't automatically know how to play; you need practice. Some people practice weight control for a lifetime," Schmitt said.

Women gain weight much more easily than men because a larger portion of the female's body is made up of fat. Because of this, it is also harder for women to take the weight off, said Schmitt.

Women are also scrutinized more for being overweight and become more obsessed with shedding the extra pounds. "Quick diets" are problematic for women and anorexia is always a threat.

Schmitt added that anorexic people tend to talk constantly about food and its calorie content. They are often thin, but constantly complain about being overweight. Schmitt said that the best way to help these people is to convince them that they have a problem and encourage them to go for help.

Schmitt's diet tips are quite simple. Reducing fat content and increasing complex carbohydrates is her key rule. Fat should not make up more than 20 percent of

Dr. Nolan writes his way to Emmys

By SCOTT M. SCHEIDT
Staff Reporter

Dr. Patrick J. Nolan, an award-winning writer, has discovered that inspiration can be found almost anywhere: Bob's Big Boy, The China Buddah or even Villanova. Yes, Villanova.
Boy, The China Buddah or even Villanova. Yes, Villanova.

These were Nolan's inspiration sites and writing locations where he worked on "Midnight Rainbows." Nolan wrote this one-man play during fall 1990, basing it upon the life of American-playwright Eugene O'Neil.

This year marks Nolan's 30th year as a professor of English at Villanova.

Although "Midnight Rainbows" received very good reviews from the press after its 1991 spring debut at Villanova under his direction, Nolan is most notably known for his role in the 1979 film production of "The Jericho Mile." He wrote the original story and co-wrote the screenplay for this film, which received three Emmy awards and became the most sought after made-for-television movie ever produced.

Nolan has published two scholarly articles in "The O'Neill Newsletter," drawing upon his knowledge of the playwright whom he and many others consider "the Shakespeare of American Theater." Because of his scholarship, Nolan was able to write "Midnight Rainbows" without reference to any particular source, over what amounted to a period of approximately six weeks of nightly dining at Bob's Big Boy or The China Buddah. "The food's good and it's cheap," he said. "It just seemed to work." Though Nolan concluded, "I will probably never do it that way again."

This year marks Nolan's 30th year as a professor of English at Villanova. When asked whether he considers himself a professor or a playwright, he answered, "I'm both." Nolan enjoys his status as professor and his position in the Villanova English

Villanova Viewpoint questions student environmental values

By SUSAN BURNS
Staff Reporter

As the world crumbles around us, and the air we breathe becomes increasingly precious, we must look at what we are doing to help our earth and strengthen its weakening condition.

While we might roll our eyes or groan at this thought and tell ourselves that we do enough for our environment, it's time to seriously question our role as living, breathing members of society.

The Villanova Environmental Group (VEG) is one organization which is taking this first step further through action. So far, VEG has sent members to various environmental conferences, planted roses along the Blue Route, held clean-up days in Bryn Mawr and planned a campus Earth Day.

However, according to group member and senior geography major Kristin Romano, "The biggest problem on the local level is lack of activity. It's not ignorance, just laziness."

Most students definitely seem to be environmentally conscious, and even aware of this absence of concern for action.

Freshman biology major Dave Ferris agreed and said, "There is apathy in general toward the environment. We've got to become more conscious of the cleanliness and sacredness of the environment and the need not to defile it."

"The respect for the environment here at Villanova worries me," said junior chemistry major Chuck Grindel, specifically of the condition of dorms and the area by the Quad. "If this is how students treat things now, how will they treat the real world?"

Students do in fact see and express different problems and solutions for our world on campus.

A major cause for concern is "the use of polystyrene and plastic in Dougherty and the Connelly Center" in the mind of freshman international business major Aaron Peters. He is referring to the styrofoam cups and plastic utensils that are offered in each dining area.

Sophomore sociology major Joanna Schwartz and biology major Wendy Hanna agreed and think that their use should be eliminated altogether. "It is surprising, really, that we use them at all."

In addition, they believe that the recycling program itself should be expanded and plastics should be considered.

Junior psychology major Paul Buttacavoli also sees a need for plastic recycling bins, for he knows many empty plastic containers are thrown away in dorms. The dorms could benefit from more newspaper collections as well.

Looking past local troubles and onto a world scale, the main focus for concern, according to students, varies from toxic waste to air pollution, and depletion of the ozone layer to environmental apathy.

Romano believes that waste management is the most challenging problem for our world to tackle, and explained, "Waste management incorporates everything, including incineration, trash dumping in the ponds, streams and oceans, air pollution,

Talley leads bone marrow transplant fundraiser

By TONY VITTI
Staff Reporter

How would you like to win a lottery that helps save someone's life? Andy Talley, coach of the football team, and the Greeks at Villanova will hold a bone marrow typing drive April 12 to improve the odds of survival of someone with leukemia or a blood disorder. The winner receives no payoff, only the satisfaction of saving another's life.

The odds of survival are not favorable for the leukemia patient because they need to find a perfect match for a bone marrow donor.

"That's a terrible thing when you know all you need is a match, and you know there's a match out there somewhere, but they are not in the registry [of potential bone marrow donors]. It has to be terribly frustrating," said Talley.

"All we're asking [people] to do is to take a blood test, that's all, it's harmless, it doesn't hurt." The goal of the drive is to find matches with as many people as they possibly can by taking a small amount of blood and to get them placed on the national registry of potential bone marrow donors.

"The biggest problem is that the national registry is too small and the chances of finding a match is 20,000-to-1. That's why you need a huge registry," said Talley, who has met victims of leukemia.

The more people who place themselves on this registry increase the chances of a patient, winning the lottery. Otherwise that person will die.

"I know I could muster up all the teams in the country. Who would ever say no to me?" joked Talley.

Twenty-four children a day die from leukemia. This disease mostly affects younger children.

"This particular cause piqued my interest because we've been visiting the St. Christopher's Hospital for Children ever since I started coaching here. We go down once a month with 10 players and a coach and we visit all the children and usually most of them are terminally ill. It's very moving, especially to a football player at Villanova who's a very healthy guy and who's really got the world by the tail. Then all of a sudden he sees this little kid shivering and shaking and helpless. It tends to make them feel quite humble and appreciative of the health that they have," said Talley.

He wants to get a program started at Villanova that would spread nationally and would include all college football teams.

"This is a way the football team can help, because I've got 95 healthy bodies on my team, if I could get my 95 kids signed up and put on the registry, I could get other college football teams to come aboard, the Big East Conference, the PAC-10 ... we would significantly raise the number of potential donors."

"I know I could muster up all the teams in the country. Who would ever say no to me?" joked Talley.

the entire calorie count of the food. This can be determined by multiplying the grams of fat listed on the package by nine.

Schmitt recommends at least two cups of fruits and vegetables a day, along with salad items, rice, pasta and wheat breads. She pointed out that alcohol contains a great deal of calories. While abstaining from alcohol is the healthiest and least caloric choice, beer and wine have fewer calories than liquor and Schmitt suggests adding wine to a club soda to make a spritzer as a healthy choice.

Exercise is also a very important part of weight reduction. Mark Raymond, director of physical therapy at Chestnut Hill Rehabilitation Hospital, warns against jumping right into a complex exercise regimen after being dormant for a long period of time. He defines aerobic exercise as an activity that raises the heart rate to a certain percentage of the maximum heart rate and keeps it there for 15 minutes. He urges students to ease into spring, to choose an enjoyable activity and to have a physical before beginning any exercise.

Aerobic activity done four to six times a week for three months should begin to produce results, Raymond said. An exercise plan should be constructed, including a warm up and cool down period. He recommends the book "Fit or Fat" by Covert Bailey for those who are serious about starting an exercise program. He stresses a medical check-up before beginning and consistency once the program is started.

According to experts, taking it slowly prevents injuries and results in long-term success. A diet and exercise program started now should begin to show results as the warm season approaches. In the meantime, work on slimming winter-wasted bodies under bulky sweaters and pants to prepare for a proud unveiling in the summer sun.

Student-run play focuses on family relationships

By GRETCHEN FISHER and PEGGY AGOLINO
Assistant Features Editors

"Why can't I talk to my parents?" If we only had a dime for every time we have asked ourselves that question. Lack of communication with parents is something to which most Villanova students can relate. Senior Joe Hackett has put this problem into words — namely, into a play called "The Obscenity" which will soon be performed at Villanova.

The play is a "tragedy about a lack of communication within a family," said Hackett. The one-act play, casting four family members, focuses on the strained relationship between a business-minded father and his son. The son's differing interests in athletics and theater create a rift between the two.

Another factor in the deterioration of their relationship is the fatal illness of the mother, whose failing health is symbolic of the decaying relationship between the father and son. Still, an element of hope endures throughout the play that the father and son will resolve their differences. Some surprises may be in store, as work on the play is still in progress.

> The play is a "tragedy about a lack of communication within a family."
> Joe Hackett

Hackett had taken a playwrighting course at Villanova taught by Bruce Graham, by whom he said he was very inspired. Graham is the second Villanova playwright to have a play on Broadway. Hackett started writing his play last summer while working as a production assistant on a movie set in Chicago.

While involved in a directing class, senior John Griffin, the producer and director of the play, teamed up with Hackett. Last fall they produced a scene which has since developed into the play. They asked the Villanova Student Theater to help with the production, and three members are characters in the play. These actors are senior Kate Geoghegan and juniors Ray Saraceni and Andy Firda. The fourth character is played by Ruth Scarborough from Philadelphia.

The play, said Griffin, is "abstract and symbolic." Its opening is planned for Wednesday, April 8, and will continue through April 12, with the exception of Saturday, April 11. All shows are scheduled for 8 p.m. in the St. Mary's Auditorium.

department, and emphasized that one does not get into playwrighting to become a professor or vice versa. "Publishing is something you do along the way ... It's difficult to do both all the time," he said.

Nolan began writing one-act plays in Detroit, where he was working on his master's degree. After arriving at Villanova, he began writing full-length plays.

Nolan's earlier work was championed by Edward Dowling, the man who discovered the works of the great American playwright Tennessee Williams and who was also known for his work with W.C. Fields and May West. Norman Taurog, a major director who directed the original "Boys Town" and Elvis Presley's "G.I. Blues," was also very interested in Nolan's work and wanted to direct a work of his titled "Blues for 100 Yards."

Many of the fascinating themes Nolan writes about are "plucked" from his readings. After reading an article about a prisoner who could run the mile in Olympic time, he conceived the story idea for "The Jericho Mile." From "Damn Yankees" he found the obscure combination of religion, baseball and sex. From "Blues for 100 Yards," he created and used a variation on this combination: jazz, football and sex.

Most of the subject matter in Dr. Nolan's work is imaginative, while some of it is based on a great deal of research. This is the case with a current work of his titled "In This Corner," a story involving Belva Ann Bennett Lockwood, the first woman to be on the presidential ballot in the election of 1884.

To date, Nolan has written approximately 30 scenarios that could become completed scripts and added to the half dozen or so he was written thus far.

and landfills." She said it has become increasingly important to understand where products come from and where they are going.

As far as helping to solve these problems both locally and worldwide, students do not seem to understand the power that they possess to make improvements, Romano said.

"When I get into a position where I can make a difference, I will, but for now I can take care of my own stuff. I can not act on a societal level, though," said Grindel.

Romano disagreed. "Little things make a difference!" She suggested such easy acts as recycling, using less styrofoam, bike-riding and walking, limiting water consumption by taking shorter showers and conserving electricity by turning off unnecessary lights and unplugging the television.

Whatever the method, taking responsibility for the environment and our resources begins with action. Good intentions are useful, but without a tangible commitment to change, we will continue to watch the decline of our environment.

Marrow typing fundraiser an expensive process to get typed — an approximate cost of $60 per person. He plans to have each new player that comes on the team typed.

Now, with the help of Michael Grosso, member of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity and IFC representative, Coach Talley is getting the Greek organizations at Villanova involved.

Tuesday, Cathleen Bowes, a representative for the Committee to Benefit the Children (CBC), met with the fraternities and sororities to coordinate a giant fundraiser to the held one week before the bone marrow typing drive on the weekend of April 4 and 5. CBC has already promised to contribute $5,000 to this fundraising project.

The goal is to raise enough funds to have as many people as possible typed the following weekend, April 12.

When someone becomes a winner by being picked as a match, a life can be saved by the donation of the "winning bone marrow."

The procedure of donating bone marrow is a very simple one that extracts only 2 percent to 3 percent of marrow from the hip area. Soreness may occur for a few days, but that is the only problem you have to face. Consider the problem the leukemia patient would have to face without lifesaving bone marrow.

Being typed may save someone's life and help them win something better than the lottery, someone's life.

According to coach Talley, "It's better than any Superbowl or Big East Championship or Yankee Conference Championship or anything that I can think of. I can't think of anything that could be greater than saving somebody's life."

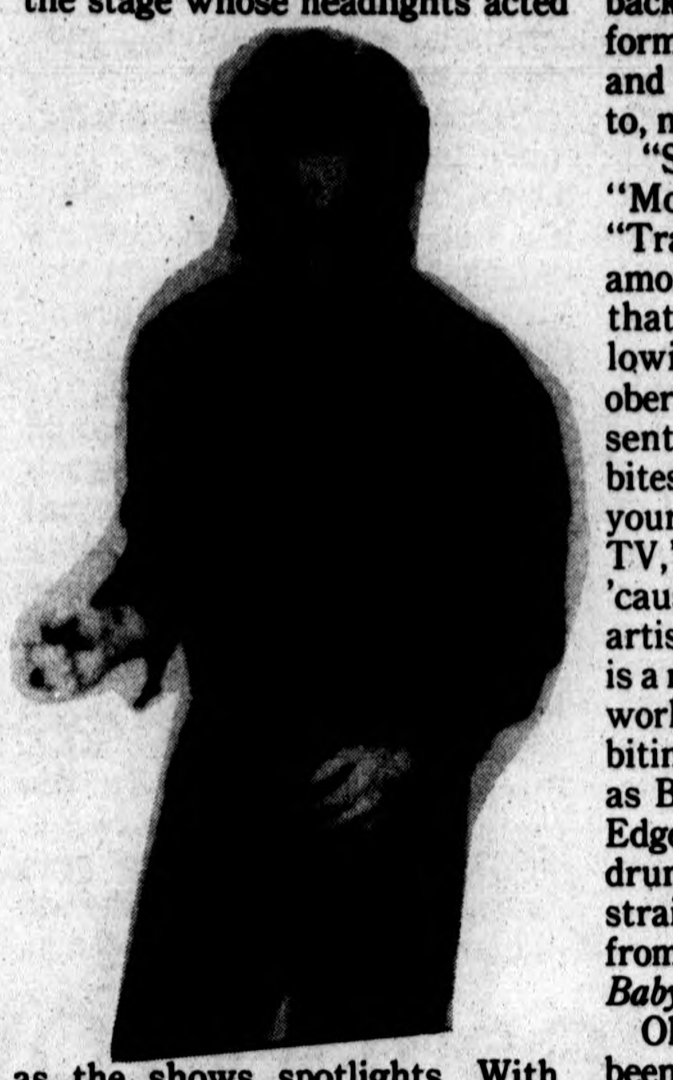
U2's 'Zoo' runs rampant in Philly

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"Have we been to Vegas or what?" asks U2 lead singer Bono to the packed Spectrum on Mar. 10. This question was rather ironic coming from the ring leader of a band that was once politically concerned and simply proud to be from God's country. But irony was the focal point and lesson of the evening. Some might say they've sold out due to their flashy appearance and elaborate set. Even Bono himself paused in the middle of a song to declare, "Were taking this Elvis thing too far." However, when looking strictly from the surface it might appear to be that simple, but, as any U2 fan would commonly know, nothing they do is simplistic but rather psychological.

"Welcome to Zoo TV, we're what's on tonight ... and so are you," continued Bono as he introduced Philly to his new toy, "Zoo TV." Aside from being the title of their 1992 North American arena tour, it is an elaborate array of various sized TV monitors that compile U2's new (and first) staging props. Above these screens were a fleet of cars casted over the stage whose headlights acted as the shows spotlights. With images and messages flashing across the screen at lighting speed, the band seemed to swallow up society's corruption and spit it back to them on the most powerful form of communication that exists and the only one people respond to, namely the boob tube.



"Sex," "Power," "Corruption," "Money," "Media," "Panic," "Trash" and "Boom" were all among merely a handful of wrongs that the band broadcasts. Following these socially negative obervations were the band's one sentence responses: "Ambition bites the nails of success," "Reject your weakness," "Watch more TV," "The universe is exploding 'cause of one man's lie," "Every artist is a cannibal," "Everyone is a racist but you," and "It's your world, you can change it." Here biting sarcasm was implemented as Bono along with guitarist the Edge, bassist Adam Clayton and drummer Larry Mullen Jr. blazed straight through eight of 12 tunes from their latest creation, Achtung Baby.

Old U2 spirit and drive had not been lost. Midway through the set the band ventured into the heart

'Little Village' features all-star lineup

By JOHN KAZMIERCZAK
Staff Reporter

Little Village, already dubbed music's newest "supergroup," released its self-titled debut album last week. Adopting its name from a Sonny Boy Williamson blues song, Little Village's all-star cast of Ry Cooder, John Hiatt, Jim Keltner and Nick Lowe combine to complement and augment each other's similar bluesy styles.

Technically, this release is actually Little Village's second album: in 1987 Cooder, Keltner and Lowe backed Hiatt on his comeback album Bring the Family. It is important to note that Little Village is not led by Hiatt, however. On the contrary, there is a strong emphasis on equality and democracy throughout the album: all 11 tracks were co-written by the four members and each performer gets his share of the limelight.

Little Village manages to achieve three very different styles of music on this album. Hiatt starts the pop-based fun with "Solar Sex Panel," a humorous narrative about a man asserting that his balding head is actually the environmentally safe power source for an incredible sex machine: "That fossil fuel's got no renewal/it can't hold a candle/ to my solar sex panel." Lowe continues the fast and funny action with "Take Another Look" and "She Runs Hot," making fun of a rival's car and girlfriend at the same time: "She might run cold for you but she runs hot for me."

The name Little Village reflects the strong blues influence present, as all the members' styles are commonly based on Memphis blues. This is evident in such songs as "Big Love" and "Fool Who Knows," both superbly accompanied by Cooder's expert guitar.

This album truly shines in the most unexpected category, that of deep, emotional, socially aware songs. "Do You Want My Job," a calypso-inspired piece, reflects the irony and sense of compromise of an ex-fisherman now forced to dump radioactive pollutants into the ocean to support his family. On "Don't Think About Her When You're Trying To Drive," the album's best track by far, a tender-voiced Hiatt, sublimely backed by Cooder's shimmering guitarwork, consoles a heartbroken friend.

The key to this album's success is this group-achieved symbiosis, the way in which each member simultaneously both shines individually and supports the other three. Add to this a surprising amount of stylistic and lyrical diversity and Little Village comes up a winner.

Richard Marx reveals his new direction

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Richard Marx spoke to David J. Criblez in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Dressed in a casual outfit but still remaining in trend, Richard Marx waits patiently. He is doing a three day marathon of press appearances which finds him in the main ballroom at the Helmsley Palace being taunted by an HBO correspondent. "What's it like being the only solo male singer in the history of the Billboard charts to have seven consecutive top ten singles ... do you feel, special?" Restraining from rolling his eyes in disbelief, Marx responds, "Special? Not really."

By this time the spotlight has been turned off and he greets me with a fresh smile and firm hand shake. "How do you put up with all this?" I ask. "It's not that bad if you get it done in one shot, but some people ... (obviously referring to the HBO interview) just don't get it. Billboard is not what it is about," says Marx.

VILLANOVAN: The music business is the toughest in the world, however you hit it right on the mark from the first day. What was your initial reaction?

MARX: "It was like one of those guys who can't play ball at all and then they catch a fly ball and they go ... (makes a surprised face). I had been rejected through the mail since I was eighteen from various record companies. I finally got a deal by the time I was 23. It was a one-album deal with practically no money behind it. I thought if I ever had a hit record it would be off the eighth album. When "Don't Mean Nothing" came out I was oblivious. I wanted it to do good enough so that I could make another album. But rock radio really got behind it. Once that was over I was like, 'Well that was fun,' but it just kept going ..."

V: You left your old record company after two successful LPs, (Richard Marx, Repeat Offender) ... why?

MARX: "One of my big beefs at EMI was that they had complete control of the singles. I had total control over the music. But it started happening during Repeat Offender (Marx's second album). We started off with a rock-n-roll song, "Satisfied" which did well. The plan was to release, "Nothing You Could Do About It," a fairly fast paced song, but the record company leaked "Right Here Waiting" (a ballad that is Marx's biggest hit to date) to the radio stations and something happened. I didn't even plan to put it on the album cause it was such a personal song, I thought no one would get it but me and my wife. But it took on a life of its own. The record company then released another ballad ("Angelia") due to the success of "Right Here Waiting." So for months whenever people heard me they would identify me as a ballad singer however it only counts for 8 percent of what I do. That's how you get pigeonholed and the public, even though it's not their fault, creates an image of you. You almost lose control of who you are.

V: Now you are here with your third album Rush Street in a new company (Capitol Records). You seem to be heading in many diverse directions. How do you view this new progression?

MARX: "Well, for one thing, now that I'm on Capitol I control the singles ... As for the album, it has the most aggressive rock-n-roll yet. But we did not want to start with that, that is why we put out "Keep Coming Back" first. It basically goes against the grain of what's out there now. It's really an R&B song, you don't hear those anymore. I wanted people to see the other sides of me. I don't see the singles as being the focus at all. It's the music itself. Singles are the extension to the public. I don't look to write hit singles. I leave that up to Marky Mark and the Funky Bunch and C&C Music Factory."

V: As you well know there is so much talent out in the world that is constantly overlooked. What do you think made you so unique causing you to get noticed?

MARX: "The combination of timing and being able to deliver the goods as well as having the songs or the voice, strikes a chord somehow. I know I was at the right place at the right time but I also knew that, all humbleness aside, I had to ability to deliver. I don't think I am a great songwriter or singer yet. But I do know I do good work. What I am aspiring to do is become great. Sometimes you have to give up good to be great and I am willing to do that. I don't consider myself successful yet. I think I've had success and I am very fortunate. But, I will consider myself successful when I am 45 and people still want to

Ice-T raps, rocks and raves at Cabaret

ICE-T

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"Ha-ha-ha-ha, aw yea — that's right I'm back mofo . . . ya shoulda killed me las yeer!" declared Ice-T, a man who brings more to rap than simply sharp rhymes and hooks, he gives people a piece of his mind but if "you move on the Ice, den ya goin' ta sleep!"

Ice's recent club tour hit the Chestnut Cabaret right between the eyes on Feb. 27. With a half rap show, featuring his Rhyme Syndicate and a half metal show, featuring his debut band Body Count, his audience is growing. The balance was well-kept but as usual and always the audience was out of control and at Ice's comand at all times.

Digging back to his roots Ice ran through his catalog featuring "I'm Your Pusher," "Iceberg," "Power," "6 in the Morning" and "Colors." Newer material such as "New Jack Hustler" from his movie, "New Jack City," "Ricochet" from his movie of the same and the title of his last LP, "O.G.-Original Gangster" was celebrated through various rounds of slam dancing.

Although Ice always has something to say . . . "Racism is a disease that keeps on spreadin'. It's not automatic. Racism is taught. You take a Mexican kid, American kid, Black kid and Oriental kid and put them all in a sandbox at a young age and have them grow up together they would learn to love and protect each other. It's when their parents tell them one's better than the other and that they don't mix is where the problem starts."

Much of this anger was captured in the Body Count segment where ferocious songs like, "KKK Bitch," "Mama's Got To Die Night," "There Goes The Neighborhood" and "Cop Killer" grab racism by the throat with the use of hardcore riffs and drum beats.

"They even try to segregate music. White people have rock and roll and blacks have R&B. Whites have heavy metal and blacks have rap," Ice preaches, "Body Count is what breaks the barrier and proves that we can all jam under the same roof."

Although Ice promotes peace, his projections center upon violence. "Violence is life. Peace is a dream, reality is a knife," raps Ice in "Colors," "I call it as I see it. My raps are the mirror of the society that surrounds me, not my personal likes or dislikes. You can't face it, tough s--t, dats life homey."

Roxette's pop power ignites the Tower

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Roxette is deceiving. Most of their image and sound has been only two dimensional (video and radio), but this has expanded. On their debut tour, "Join the Worldwide Joyride 91-92," they prove two things: their sound can be reproduced live and pop music does have a future. Their Mar. 8 Tower Theater performance was rather cunning and most of all clever.

With only two American albums to work with, it was rather amazing to hear a string of 10 hits in a set of 18 songs. Opening with "Hot Blooded" and leading straight into "Dangerous," the dynamic duo was ready and relaxed.

Although Roxette is pigeonholed into the pop regime, their sound walks a fine line between bubble gum and believe it or not, soul. Singer Marie Fredriksson's voice is not sampled, simulated or synthesized but merely simplistic. "Soul Deep" and "Spending My Time" exemplified this fact as she belted out tracks without showing any sign of restriction. Her style has sex appeal that is backed with sheer vocal strength even Madonna or Mariah could not compete with.

The problem with Roxette is also the reason for their success. Their packaging is so sugary its almost too vivid, too bright. "The Big L" showed guitarist/vocalist Per Gessle running into a big hologram spelling L-O-V-E which was distracting and lessoned the music's impact. Gessle's verbal communication with the audience was elementary as he spent most of the evening wearing his "Get-Ready-Here-Comes-The-Big Song" face. But despite the glammor and flash, its the hooks that lie within successful Roxette hits, "Dressed For Sucess" and "The Look," produce an intangible sound that instantly attracts any listener's ear.

Their performance of songs like the accoustic "Watercolors in the Rain" and the rocker ballad "(do you get) Excited?" are in fact where they should be heading. But perhaps the evening's best piece was the emotion of Fredriksson's solo piano intro to "It Must Have Been Love." This vocal beauty bloomed with such effervescence that each note resembled a delicate petal being plucked off a stem she held in sorrow due to her fallen love.

Yet the "Joyride" encore fed the audience three giant balloons to toy with, again reverting from the music, while still remaining entertaining. The second revived the power melodies of "Listen to Your Heart" closing the evening on a less glossy note.

Some may laugh at Roxette and write them off as a mere throwaway band who writes mindless pop tunes that plague the airwaves and cash in big, but if you look under the candy coating, talent remains along with the ability to transcend emotional messages. Perhaps their ways might be extravagant, but then again who's complaining?

New face Russ Irwin opened the show meshing rock piano with touches of jazz and classical grooves that wowed the enthused audience. Performing his hit, "My Heart Belongs To You," Irwin showed potential with his unique style that just might soar over a chart filled with loud hair-heads and foul-mouthed rappers.

NRBQ performs innovative and lively rock

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

NRBQ can be considered the underdog of rock bands. Although they have had several brushes with success and have been music innovators throughout their 23-year career, NRBQ continues to be familiar only to a select few. That small group of fans includes Keith Richards, Bonnie Raitt, Elvis Costello, Ray Davies and the Replacements. In the past, their shows were attended by Charlie Daniels and Jimi Hendrix. Noted by other musicians for their songwriting abilities, NRBQ songs have been performed by Dave Edmunds, the Fabulous Thunderbirds, the Allman Brothers and Bonnie Raitt.

Despite their popularity among other recording artists, fame has eluded the band for many years. One amusing example of fate's unkindness to NRBQ consists of their absence from Woodstock. Although they were not at the famous music festival, they were near it — at a club 40 miles away playing for a group of soldiers on leave. With their most recent release on Virgin Records, Wild Weekend, critics praised their efforts and predicted NRBQ's emergence on the mainstream music scene.

The album did produce great songs including "It's a Wild Weekend," "Boozoo, That's Who!" and "If I Don't Have You," but it didn't make NRBQ a household name with the general public. They are still a great band who creates spirited and original rock'n'roll. They are also known for energetic live performances which have included such revolutionary facets as tar and feathering, the explosion of Cabbage Patch Kid dolls, parading around in Indian headresses and sharing the stage with wrestling's Captain Lou Albano. NRBQ will arrive at the Chestnut Cabaret on Mar. 20.

NRBQ performs at the Chestnut Cabaret on March 20.

FLASH: The 23 East Cabaret is now featuring a "multi dimensional night club event" every Wednesday night. The Eye Opener Club Nights feature drink specials from 8 to 10 p.m., club games offering cash and prizes, and music and video offerings from the '60s through the '90s. Entertainment is provided by DJ Nature Boy, DJ/VJ Jammit, and DJ Purcell. Admission is only $2 with an invitation and $4 without one.

The Connells, whose albums cross the lines between alternative and popular music, will appear at the Chestnut Cabaret on St. Patrick's Day, Mar. 17. The North Carolina band has a no-frills approach to their work which began in their early performing days when they would hardly move while singing on stage. Now they have adopted a more lively stage presence, but their music is unadulterated rock influenced by legendary groups such as the Beatles, the Who and the Clash. A local alternative band, the Winebottles, will open for the Connells. The Winebottles have a modern sound which supports their refreshing and creative lyrics.

Marx branches out on new LP 'Rush St.'

hear my music."

V: Were you ever pressured by record companies, early on, to be packaged into a set image to sell yourself?

MARX: "I wish I had gotten that much attention back then! (He laughs). Many people in the industry have said, 'Well Richard Marx's problem is that he has no image.' But the beauty of it all is that my image has always simply been, just me. I never tried to portray something else. People that have these images, Prince or Madonna, I think to myself, have got to wake up and ask themselves: Who am I this week? What am I wearing? It has to be tiring."

V: Were you ever in a band or was it always just you?

MARX: "It was always just me. I was offered lead singer spots in several struggling bands. In fact I was offered an audition for Chicago when Peter Cetera left, cause I had worked with those guys before doing studio fill-in stuff. But, I didn't connect with them. I like to be in control of my own music. In bands there's too much inner jealousy and nit picking that the music gets effected by that friction and it shows."

V: Being an attractive guy, do you feel that this might act as a hinderance, rather than an additive, to your music in the sense that people might be attracted to you firstly in a physical sense and leaving the musical element secondary?

MARX: "You know what it is . . . in 1986 women did not stare at me nor I did not have women hand me their phone numbers. In 1987, when my record, singles and videos came out and became popular, all those things started happening. If you make a video or have a hit record, you are going to get recognized and that physical attraction will arise no matter who you are or what you look like. My wife, Cynthia (Rhodes, actress: "Dirty Dancing," "Staying Alive") has been with me since I was a 21 year-old struggling geek songwriter. So I know she loves me for who I am, not what I am, therefore it has helped me deal with the attention that I receive by giving me a more down-to-earth perspective and more confidence in myself as a person. Many stars take that fan-crazed attention seriously and start believing their own hype causing their own down fall."

V: What is your impression of MTV? Do you think it has taken over radio completely? Has it helped or hindered music and in what way?

MARX: "I think MTV is definitely influencing radio much more than it should. When MTV hit, the music business was at an all time low. Labels were losing money, something had to happen. MTV turned things around with it visual concept. It was such an innovative idea. Then something happened . . . the visual began to replace the talent part. Milli Vanilli pulled off a scam that has made everyone think twice about every artist and if they are genuine. How many artists on the charts today can sit at a piano and entertain? I blame MTV for being responsible for the fact that there is so little talent on the charts going with the philosophy that if you look great that's all that matters. But I do give them credit for putting on stripped down shows like "Unplugged" and honestly exposing controversies such as the lip syncing ordeal. But still they are the ones perpetuating it."

V: Do you see videos as being unavoidable?

MARX: "For now they are . . . but I wish all the artists would get together to make a pact to take a year off from videos because its getting to be too much. Something has got be happen. The radio/video market has become a vicious circle in that albums have become too dependent on it. The public is losing their imaginations."

V: Speaking of videos, apparently there has been some controversy over your video for your second single, "Hazard." Could you explain?

MARX: "The controversy is that the video plays upon a murder mystery. Kids are calling the radio stations asking 'who did it?' There's no answer, its ambiguous. When I wrote it I did not end the story and the video leaves it hanging, leaving it up to the viewers to think about it and use their own minds to establish their own interpretations. I am very proud of it."

V: You came from a musical background. Apparently, your father was a jazz pianist and a TV jingle writer and your mom was a big band singer. Did they influence you in any way?

MARX: "I'm sure. Probably even more so then I realize. They were the ones that turned me on to the music that initially inspired me such as Billy Joel, Paul Simon and the Eagles. Plus simply through the genes I'm sure I picked up some musical touches. My old man had a knack for creating 30 second pop songs in a jingle format. He wanted me to work with him, but here came a parting of the ways in the sense that I refused to back a product with my music. Plus I didn't want that competitive wedge to come between us. I wanted to stand on my own. We still work together. He did the horn arrangement on 'Children of the Night' and my mom sings background on some of my songs. So I am still tight with them."

V: You sang background on all of Lionel Richie's solo albums. Did music industry?

MARX: "No. I don't mean that in a negative way. He let me hang with him. He heard my demo tape and hired me for background vocals. But I was like a sponge absorbing as much as I could possibly learn about recording. It turns out that my approach to making records is totally opposite from his but never the less it was an experience that was worthwhile. But he let the word out that there was a new kid in town."

V: You also collaborated with producer/songwriter David Foster a number of times. Did he effect you in any way?

MARX: "David was basically my he open any doors for you in the hero. I met him through Lionel. We hit it off instantly and became great friends. One day he told me that I never was going to make it as an artist. He said he didn't think I had it. He thought my producing and songwriting skills were good but that was it. At first I was devastated. Then I got pissed. I believed that their was room for me. We later had a personal falling out. He became a Hollywood Malibu star producer. This is also why I parted ways with my producer David Cole (who produced Marx's first two LPs). He also lost touch by getting caught in his own fame. I choose to take a more basic path by remaining close to home with my family and my son Brandon. I learned a lot from both of them but we are all very different individuals."

V: How do you stay focused and in tune with the reality that surrounds you? Is it hanging with your family and going to local joints?

MARX: "I think it helps. The more you lead the life of a regular person, the better you will identify with the public as an artist. Look at Michael Jackson . . . as successful as he is I don't think he could write a lyric that we can all identify with cause he doesn't identify with us. He has isolated himself so much that it seems that its almost like he's from another planet. He gets a bad rap but he's so talented. People lose sight of that cause they can't identify with him. I don't want that to happen to me and it won't cause what I present, either through video, stage or song, is me and nobody else. I think that honesty transfers in my music and I believe it makes a difference."

of the arena on a extended branch of the stage to perform "Angel of Harlem" and Lou Reed's "Satellite of Love" acoustically. The Irish quintet rekindled their spiritual fire, establishing their famous eternal bond with their fans by getting as close to them as possible in what seemed to resemble a small pub-like atmosphere.

A string of older and more traditional material, none surpassing 1984's The Unforgettable Fire LP, such as the well seamed medley of "Bad/All I What Is You," a fierce version of "Bullet the Blue Sky," "Running to Stand Still," and bookends "Where the Streets Have No Name" and "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" were well received. However, "Pride (In the Name of Love)" found Bono not that vocally powerful as he failed to hit the high notes, letting the audience sing the chorus as he quipped, "It doesn't matter if my voice wasn't working, Philly," complimenting them on their job while simultaneously covering his own behind.

Entering the stage for the encore decked out in a silver streaked glitter suit, contrasting his own persona as the common man, Bono glazed at himself in a full length mirror and kissed his reflective image stating, in an over exaggerated guido accent, "Your f----n beautiful!" This was not vain or pompous but rather a mockery of the self indulgence of the rock performer of today commonly displays. The stage was bathed in disco balls and laser lights as "Desire," "Ultraviolet (Light My Way)," "With or Without You" and the profound "Love Is Blindness" were performed in the same realm of blatant gaudiness that served as a proclamation rather then a cheapened sellout.

Missing were the U2 concert favorites: "I Will Follow," "Sunday Bloody Sunday," "40," etc., but they would in fact be out of place here and off the mark as U2 tries to bring us into realization that our own community is breaking down. "Zoo TV" is exactly what we experience everyday. We are becoming more animalistic with our instincts as the further progression of technology, instead of helping us, causes the break down of not only our world but more importantly, our own minds.

SET LIST: "Zoo Station," "The Fly," "Even Better Than the Real Thing," "Mysterious Ways," "One," "Until the End of the World," "Whose Gonna Ride Your Wild Horses," "Trying to Throw Your Arms Around the World," "Angel of Harlem," "Satellite of Love," "Bad," "All I Want Is You," "Bullet the Blue Sky," "Running to Stand Still," "Where the Streets Have No Name," "Pride (In the Name of Love)," "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For."

ENCORES: "Desire," "Ultraviolet (Light My Way)," "With or Without You" and "Love is Blindness."

Movie Clips

GLADIATOR: Directed by Rowdy Herrington, this is the story of Tommy Riley (James Marshall of Twin Peaks fame), who becomes involved in Chicago's illegal amateur boxing underworld. After leaving an uncaring father (John Heard), Tommy turns to Horn (Brian Dennehy), the boxing promoter eager to make money from Tommy's fighting ability. Basically a "Rocky" carbon copy, Gladiator's strengths lie in its cast and the powerful fight scenes. B—

MEMOIRS OF AN INVISIBLE MAN: This Chevy Chase vehicle focuses on special effects, showing what it looks like when an invisible man swallows food. Chase is a stock analyst catapulted into the world of espionage after an accident in a lab renders him invisible. Director John Carpenter offers a predictable story which doesn't amount to much more than special effects. C—

STOP! OR MY MOM WILL SHOOT: Sylvester Stallone plays a cop in this flop which proves he is as bad at comedy as he is in dramatic roles. Estelle Getty of the television show "The Golden Girls" is Stallone's tough gun-toting mother. Although the film is bad, it is pulling a high profit at the box office because of the audience drawing power of Stallone and Getty. F

WAYNE'S WORLD: Everyone's favorite "Saturday Night Live" skit hits the big screen with Mike Myers and Dana Carvey reprising their roles as Wayne and Garth. The comic duo is amusing and childlike as they must decide whether or not to sell their TV show "Wayne's World" to a yuppie (Rob Lowe) from a major network. The plot lacks substance but the laughs are abundant. B

'Bellboy' falls flat on screen

By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

Fresh off the beach from Spring Break, comedy is a hard commodity to find. While students seem to resemble either tawny sun drenched raisins or peeling lobsters, the cinematic choices for diversion are few and far between. Instead of laughing at the jokes these movies present, the viewer is more likely to laugh at the humorously bad attempts.

One such lemon is "Blame it on the Bellboy," a slapstick farce set in beautiful Italy. Dudley Moore is an inept real estate gopher boy sent to find a villa, any villa, and purchase it for a wealthy stockbroker looking to unload some extra cash. Bryan Brown ("FX") plays a hard-nosed assassin bent on hitting his mark, if he could only figure out which person in Venice is supposed to die. A hugely overweight adulterer, his wife, a beautiful con artist and a trio of Italian mafia thugs round out this ridiculous collection.

The misunderstandings begin at the hotel counter, where a bumbling bellboy (Bronson Pinchot) cannot pronounce the guests' different English names. Pinchot's character is a carbon-copy of Balkie on TV's "Perfect Strangers," except on the tube he has a brain and a personality. In "Bellboy," he's got a bad haircut, a bad part and a really horrible accent.

Despite the seeming potential in the cast, "Bellboy" fails to entertain from start to finish. Not only do its jokes fall flat, but the stupidity of every subplot insults the intelligence of its viewers. The comic talents of Dudley Moore are lost, any talents of Brown may never be found and Balkie cannot pronounce his "H's." That is the funniest part of the film. I do not hear any laughing.

"Memoirs of an Invisible Man" with Chevy Chase and Darryl Hannah fares a little better. While the somewhat creative special effects may captivate and amuse, the film itself is a flop. Chase has done better and Hannah is much better as a mute mermaid than an actress with actual dialogue.

Sly Stallone and Estelle Getty team up in the pathetic comedy "Stop! Or My Mom Will Shoot" which is faring quite well at the box office. Do not be fooled by its success, however, because many people are being swindled by two big names in a comedy that barely merits a review. Any monkey can write and produce this stuff, but it takes real talent to make money with it.

FAST FORWARD: "The Power of One" examines the life of one white South African fighter (Stephen Dorff) as he comes to terms with apartheid. The strong supporting cast includes Morgan Freeman, Armin Mueller-Stahl and John Gielgud. Director John Avildsen ("Rocky," "Lean on Me") will be interviewed, along with Stephen Dorff, in an upcoming issue of the Villanovan.

Michelle Pfeiffer stars in "Love Field," a story of a young beautician who travels to Washington, D.C., for Kennedy's funeral and falls in love with a black man (Dennis Haysbert). The film could represent another angle of the Kennedy controversy, fan the flames of uncertainty, or merely entertain. Jonathan Kaplan directs.

REWIND: Now on video, "Dead Again" has gained popularity despite the fact that it is a pretentious, overblown and overdramatized epic. Amnesiac Emma Thompson is tormented by dreams of a murder committed before her birth, and after consulting a private detective (Kenneth Branaugh) she discovers they have been together in past lives. Scissors are everywhere, as a murder weapon, the objects of innumerable art works, and finally, as a murder weapon again. Reincarnation, hypnosis and black and white scenes mix in a cinematic collage. While "Dead Again" may be fun for art students, the scissor imagery has got to go.

Other more notable releases include the riveting "Boyz in the Hood," the directorial debut of John Singleton that earned him an Oscar nomination. Set in Los Angeles, this film takes a hard look at the inner city with the first and most poignant portrayal of urban black life.

"The Doctor" stars William Hurt as a cold surgeon who becomes a patient in his own hospital. Hurt once again shines but the plot is basically predictable, emotional and flimsy.

CLIPS: Villanova's Cultural Film Series presents "My Left Foot," the story of a poor Irish boy, crippled by cerebral palsy, who became one of Ireland's major literary figures. The film plays Sat., Mar. 14, at 7 p.m., Sun., Mar. 15, at 3:30 and 7 p.m., and Mon., Mar. 16, at 7 p.m. in the Connelly Center cinema.

Sinister Sister documented

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

ROCK QUARRY

The early '80s did not contain heavy metal's most graceful moments. However, it was the time when some bands such as Metallica, Motley Crue and Van Halen began to set the trends for future head-bangers to come. Then there were those bands that were like bad junior high school memories that run along with the smell of your gym shoes, the science project you flunked and your disastrous first date. Twisted Sister is a band that runs within this element. Their new greatest hits package, Big Hits and Nasty Cuts: The Best of Twisted Sister, plays the roll of the wart on the face of modern day heavy metal.

The scene here is split into two sides of the Sister, much like the title warns. Calling some of these songs 'Big Hits' is like calling Keith Richards sober. The real biggies are "I Wanna Rock" and teenage anthem "We're Not Gonna Take It." However, with its simplistic drum beats and moronic lyrics provided by front man Dee Snider, whose face evokes images of a cheapo-Woolworth's Halloween mask. Let's face it, these songs became popular because of their comical videos. Besides, Alice Cooper covered this topic with more grace and style on his LP, School's Out.

The second side is literally hideous as it features various live renditions, a.k.a. the 'Nasty Cuts,' including cover versions of the Rolling Stones' "It's Only Rock-n-Roll" and '50s standard "Let the Good Times Roll." Why these classic rock cuts are covered is still a mystery.

What also remains a mystery is four of Sister's semi-hits and best cuts: "Come Out and Play," "Lover is for Suckers," "Burn in Hell" and their cover of "Leader of the Pack" are missing in action.

Fair Warning Greatest hits packages from Quiet Riot, Autograph and Zebra are in sight. Do not be alarmed, for it has been guaranteed that after three to four weeks on the sales racks they will be safety embedded at the bottom of the 99 cents bin. Beware!

Take the swing of Harry Connick, Jr., the lickety split fingery of Billy Joel and the attitude of Van Halen and out pops Russ Irwin, a twentysomething Long Islander who takes charge with his self-titled debut.

Irwin got a taste of the big time with his Top 30 ballad, "My Heart Belongs to You." But this track is one of his lesser achievements musically. His sound flirts within the realm of pop, but on a level that is fairly easy going down.

Producer Phil Ramone (Billy Joel, Paul Simon) extracts a crisp sound from this young man who appears with freshman qualities but seeks great heights. Songs "All I Want" and "Sea of Dreams" immediately grasp the listener's ear. His songwriting skills are strong but his vocals, or rather vocal stylings, are a bit on the whiney side and need grooming. However, this will improve with time.

SINGLE SPOTLIGHT: The Jersey Devil makes his triumphant return. Bruce Springsteen releases a double-loaded single, "Human Touch"/"Better Days," previewing his two new albums, Human Touch and Lucky Town, respectively, set to launch Mar. 31. "Days," the more traditional of the two, acts as almost a lyrical sequel to Southside Johnny's song of the same name. Meanwhile "Touch" carries over a similar hook from his last effort, "Tunnel of Love."

PEBBLES: Metallica and Guns N'Roses might join forces this summer on a double header billing. Metallica drummer Lars Ulrich claimed that since the bands are close friends and the fact that Metallica likes to go on as early as 8:00 p.m. and Guns has not been hitting the stage till 11:30 p.m., their biological clocks might mesh ... Faith No More will return this spring with their new LP, Angel Dust. A summer tour will soon follow ... U2 are already planning a summer stadium tour due to the grand success of their current Zoo TV arena tour. No information has been released on whether or not the Zoo TV theme and set list will remain ... Public Enemy are currently in negotiations over heading this summer's Lollapolooza II tour ... The Beastie Boys' new LP, Check Your Head, featuring all three members playing instruments on each cut, will arrive in mid-April. Ad-Rock even does some DJ work on the turntables himself while rapper Biz Markie guest spots on a couple of tracks.

Runners streak in to NCAAs

By LARRY LANZA
Staff Reporter

Led by an individual win in the 5000-meter run by junior Terrence Mahon, the Villanova men's track team recorded its highest finish in six years when it placed in a third place tie at the March 7-8 IC4A (Intercollegiate Asssociation of Amateur Athletes of America) Indoor Championship.

Held at Princeton University's Jadwin Gym, the 71st edition of the annual championship saw the Wildcats finish only one point behind second-place George Mason, the 1991 champion, and just seven points behind winner Manhatten College. Georgetown scored 57 points to equal 'Nova while Syracuse finished five points behind in fifth. Completing the top 10 were Seton Hall, Dartmouth, East Carolina, Connecticut and Notre Dame.

This weekend's performance indicates that the program is on the move and very healthy.
Head Coach Marty Stern

In finishing as the Cats' sole individual champion, Mahon added his title to his individual championship in last November's IC4A Cross-Country Championship. In last weekend's 5000-meter run, Mahon grabbed the lead at the 2000-meter mark and then survived a late challenge to win in 14 minutes, 24 seconds.

This weekend Mahon competes in the 5000-meter run at the NCAA Indoor Championships at the Hoosier Dome in Indianapolis. On April 11, Mahon will run with the U.S. Olympic Trials Marathon in Columbus, Ohio.

Though Mahon provided the only win, the strength of the Wildcats' IC4A performance came on three individual second places and two relay runner-up finishes.

Involved in two of those second place finishes was senior Finn Kelly. Running individually in the 1000-meter, Kelly turned in a 2:25 performance to finish less than half a second behind winner Brian Gose of Dartmouth. In that race, Kelly took over the lead at the 400-meter mark and held on at the front before being passed by Gose on the final straightaway.

Running on 'Nova's 4x800-meter relay, Kelly anchored the Cats' down with a final half-mile leg of 1:51, lagging V.U. two seconds behind event rival Georgetown, winners in 7:29. Also turning in a 1:51 leg was freshmen Ken Nason, who joined two other freshman, Chuck Silvester and Kyle Watson, on the relay.

Villanova earned a second runner-up relay finish when it ran a 9:52 in the Distance Medley to finish three seconds behind winner Boston College. In the relay, junior Brad Sumner ran the leadoff half-mile, followed by senior Joe Sigey on the quarter-mile leg, sophomore Mike Going on the three-quarter-mile leg, and freshman Louie Quintana on the anchor mile.

Sumner, Going and Quintana will join with Kelly on 'Nova's 4x800-meter relay team in the NCAA Championships at the Hoosier Dome this weekend.

Also turning in a second place finish was David Cook, who scored 3,793 points in the pentathlon to wind up 37 pointts behind winner Mike Pendergist of Mount St. Mary's. To achieve the finish, Cook ran the 55-meter high hurdles in 7.94 seconds, long jumped 20-feet-6, threw the shot 42-feet-9, high jumped 6-foot-9, and ran the 1000-meter in 2:47.83.

In the sprints, Villanova junior Salaam Gariba took second in the 55-meter and third in the 20-meter. In the 55-meter Gariba went through two trial rounds before running 6.24 in the finals. In the 200, Gariba ran 21.68 in the finals. Both event titles went to West Virginia's James Jett, whose margin of victory over Gariba in the 55-meters was only four-hundreths of a second.

This weekend Gariba competes at the NCAA in Indianapolis in the 55-meter.

Villanova's only other competitors were senior Tim Pollis, who ran 8:35 to finish sixth in his heat of the 3000-meter, and freshman David Hartman, who finished 16th in the 5000-meter in 15:31.

"This weekend's performance indicated that the program is on the move and very healthy," said Coach Marty Stern. "I'm very proud of the athletes that competed this weekend as we almost pulled it off. The athletes and I feel that the 'almost' days are nearing an end, and soon we expect to start winning some of these meets."

For V.U., last weekend's near victory in the IC4As came as the second "almost" of the season. Just a week prior, the Wildcats came through with a strong team effort to place third in the Big East Conference Championships at Syracuse. The Cats again finished only seven points out of first, which was claimed by the host Orangemen. Second place Georgetown, runaway victors in each of the two previous years, finished only four points ahead of 'Nova.

In the Big East, 'Nova's effort was led by Gariba, who won both the 55-meter and 200-meter for the second consecutive year. In the pentathlon, Cook defended his title from a year ago by breaking his own meet record.

Stern called that weekend one in which "the Villanova track program was born again."

"To single out credit would be to simply list our entire roster. It was a display not just of talent and enthusiasm, but of plain old-fashioned guts. These men sacrificed and succeeded," said Stern.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Men's Basketball Team

With their backs against the wall, the Cats needed back-to-back wins against Providence and Syracuse to further their chances of gaining an NCAA Tournament bid. In their home finale, the Cats defeated the P.C. Friars behind junior James Bryson's 17 points and 10 rebounds. The Cats then pushed their overall record past the .500 mark with their 76-56 victory over Syracuse at the Carrier Dome March 8.

The Cats are hoping to extend this winning streak at least two more games to secure another NCAA bid.

from 2.2 points per game to nearly 8.3. Walker also finished the season strong, starting the final five contests and reaching double-digits in four of those games.

After breaking their losing streak with an away victory at Seton Hall, the Cats returned to duPont Pavilion for a matchup against Providence College. With the team still becoming accustomed to their new roles, the Cats battled the second-place Friars down to the wire. However, 'Nova missed several opportunities to put away the Friars and lost in double overtime, 82-80.

After experiencing growing pains during January, the Cats went 5-4 in February and captured a tie for fifth place with the St. John's Express. During this stretch run, 'Nova lost another frustrating game at home, a one-point loss to St. John's. Instead of folding it up though, the Cats rallied to win two of their next three games, including exciting wins against the Hall and a big road victory at Providence. Junior Nikki Benedix scorched the Friars for 28 points.

The Cats, seeded sixth, then headed into the Big East Tournament and their third matchup against the Georgetown Hoyas. 'Nova dropped behind early, but calmly battled back from a 15-point deficit to outscore the Hoyas 12-1 over the final 3:48 of the first half.

The second half started off well for the Cats. The team hit its first three shots of the half and seized its largest lead of the game at 42-40. But the Cats could not sustain it.

After Nikki Benedix committed her fourth foul, the Cats soon relinquished the lead and their chances of upsetting G'town.

"It didn't show up in the books, but after Nikki picked up her fourth that's the stretch we didn't score," said Perretta.

With 17 minutes left in the game, Perretta had "no choice" but to keep his leading scorer on the bench. When Benedix returned the Hoyas were in the midst of a 12-5 run that would prove fatal for 'Nova. The Hoyas would prevail, 72-56.

"It's been typical for us," said Perretta. "We shot well then we shoot poorly. We even played better defense in the second half, but we couldn't get the ball in the hoop."

The Cats shot just 18.8 percent from the field in the second half. 'Nova ended the season at 11-17 overall and 7-12 in conference play.

With a solid nucleus returning, the Cats have high hopes both next year and down the road. An all-Big East second team selection, Benedix will look to improve on her 15.8 point scoring average and her team-leading average of 7.3 rebounds. With eight veterans returning and four highly-touted rookies, Perretta will work with a solid, experienced nucleus.

"Next year's team definitely has talent," said Perretta.

★★★★★★★★★

NOTES: This year's Wildcats established several Big East and school records. Senior captain Rosemary Magarity finished her career as the second all-time Big East leader in blocked shots with 76. Magarity also finished 10th on the all-time 'Nova scoring list with 982 career points . . . Michele Thornton set the school's record for three-point field goals in a season, 42, and the Big East record for three-pointers made during one game, five. Thornton also set the school record for minutes played by a freshman and the Big East mark for assists in a season by a rookie, 82.

Baseball pounds Rider 13-1

By ANDY FITZPATRICK

While the rest of the Villanova student body basked in the warm Florida sun enjoying Spring Break, the baseball team embarked on a six-game swing through Florida to open its 1992 season.

And it was not exactly fun-in-the-sun for the Cats.

Playing Florida schools who had already begun their seasons, 'Nova struggled in winning just one game, an 8-4 victory over Barry University. But the friendly confines of McGeehan Field proved to be a pleasant sight March 10 when the Cats got back on the right track by pounding Rider College 13-1 to move to 2-6.

"We are going to have to be more fundamentally sound," said Head Coach George Bennett.

Last year, talent could overcome some things but this team will struggle and need to play hard all the time.
Head Coach George Bennett

"This is a young team. Last year, talent could overcome some things but this team will struggle and needs to play hard all the time."

In the Rider win, pitcher Larry Kingsbury picked up his second win of the year and was backed by homeruns from outfielder Kevin Armstrong and catcher Mike Evangelista, surprisingly the team's first homeruns. Kingsbury, now 2-1, went six strong innings in a game played in a constant drizzle.

Coming off a 37-15-1 season of a year ago, including a Big East Conference championship and an NCAA Tournament bid, the Cats started the season with a much younger team after the amateur draft claimed six 'Novans. In Florida, the inexperience showed.

In the season opener March 1 the Cats were clobbered, ironically, by Nova University 18-0. They did not fare much better the next day as St. Thomas University won 10-1 despite a three-hitter by Cat hurler Ryan McGinty.

The Cats then faced nationally ranked Miami. 'Nova fell behind 6-0 in the first inning and could not recover, falling 12-2 to the Hurricanes. Both outfielder Ed Deal and Cliff Foley led the Cats with two hits apiece.

After losing 5-2 to Florida International, the Cats won their first game of the year, 8-4 over Barry University. Kingsbury picked up the win as five Wildcats had two hits each. To conclude the trip, 'Nova lost to Lynn University in a 10-5 slugfest.

To make matters worse, the Cats will be without the services of third baseman Jack Stanczak, who will miss the entire season with a broken bone in his wrist.

This year will definitely be a challenge for our club. We have already shown improvement and wins are certainly in sight if we play hard.
Head Coach George Bennett

The junior started all 53 games last year, hitting .343 with 10 homeruns and 64 RBI's.

"This year will definitely be a challenge for our club," said Bennett. "We have already shown marked improvement and wins are certainly in sight if we play hard."

This weekend the Cats travel to Bucknell and return home Sunday to play LaSalle at 1 p.m. at McGeehan Field located behind St. Mary.

If the first two games are any indication of the 1992 season, the men's lacrosse team is in for a great year.

With two wins in their first two games, the Cats manhandled their competition. In its season opener, 'Nova hosted Michigan State Feb. 29 and trounced the Spartans 11-2.

After the Spartans scored a quick goal one minute into the contest, the Cats went on a tear and scored the next nine goals. Junior Sean Haggerty and senior Jason Foote each notched first period goals as 'Nova claimed a 2-1 margin after one period.

The Cats and junior goal keeper Taymore Zarghami then proceeded to hold Michigan State scoreless over the next two periods. This defensive stand allowed enough time for the 'Nova offense to unload on the M.S.U. net for three goals in each of the following two quarters.

Foote and Haggerty led the Cats with three goals each while junior Tom Anderson netted two scores.

In their next matchup against Notre Dame March 7, the Cats battled back and forth with a tenacious fighting Irish squad before winning 14-10. The Irish jumped out to an early 4-1 lead after one quarter and managed to score the first three goals before Haggerty scored unassisted 11:30 into the opening period.

Notre Dame struck again less than one minute into the second quarter before 'Nova erupted for five consecutive goals. At halftime, the Cats came back to trail by only one goal, 7-6.

With a strong effort by Zarghami and the 'Nova defense, the Cats controlled the second half and seized the lead on a third period goal by Doug Derocher. 'Nova would not relinquish this lead and went on to shutout N.D. in the fourth quarter.

Once again, Haggerty paced the Cats with four goals and two assists while Foote, Derocher, Anderson and sophomore Rick Bontatibus each netted two scores. Through two games, Zarghami has made 29 saves and recovered a 70.7 save percentage.

In their next contest, the Cats will host rival Penn State tomorrow at noon.

Men's Week in Review

By JUSTIN KESTNER
Assistant Sports Editor

The Big East Conference regular season ended last week with a bang. When the smoke cleared, three teams owned a share of first place with 12-6 league records. Based on a tie-breaking system, Seton Hall earned the top seed in the Big East Tournament, which St. John's will host at Madison Square Garden in New York. Georgetown and St. John's settled for the second and third seeds, respectively.

SETON HALL

The Pirates enter the tournament with a four-game winning streak that includes a 78-71 victory over St. John's which gave the Hall its first-ever regular season championship. Terry Dehere led the way with 24 points while Jerry Walker added another strong performance inside. Walker finished seventh in the conference in rebounding (7.4) and 11th in scoring (14.5). Dehere, third in the league in scoring (20.8), pumped in 31 points and Bryan Caver canned 11 of 12 free throws in overtime as Seton Hall defeated host Miami 90-82 March 4. In the game, the Pirates tied a school-record with 12 three-pointers. The Hall will play the winner of last night's Providence/Boston College contest at 2 p.m. today.

GEORGETOWN

The Hoyas began the week with an embarrassing 65-49 loss at St. John's. It was only the Hoyas' third conference loss on the road this season. G'town rebounded with a 67-57 win over Pitt. Alonzo Mourning dominated play by scoring 20 points, grabbing 11 boards and rejecting eight shots. Mourning and his teammates will play the Pittsburgh/Miami winner tonight at 7 p.m.

ST. JOHN'S

The Redmen were unable to lock up the regular season crown as a result of their 78-71 loss to Seton Hall. It marked their first conference loss at home this season. Malik Sealy poured in 27 points in a losing effort. The senior forward is second in the league in scoring (21.8) and is on a pace to break Chris Mullin's record as the school's all-time leading scorer if the Johnnies can advance far enough in the post-season. That is a strong possibility if St. John's can maintain its strong defense. It allowed the second fewest points of any Big East team (65.4). The Redmen will play Connecticut tonight at 9 p.m.

SYRACUSE

The Orangemen slipped into fifth-place by dropping their last two games. After an 11-0 start, Syracuse has stumbled to a 7-9 finish. With a nucleus of young players, the Orange tend to be a streaky squad. But with those streaks go droughts, such as an eight-minute scoring vacuum in the first half of a 76-56 blowout loss to Villanova at home. Adrian Autry managed 13 points for the sluggish Orangemen. Earlier in the week, Syracuse dropped an 85-78 decision to host Connecticut. S.U. will try to avoid losing three times to 'Nova when the teams square off today at noon.

CONNECTICUT

The Huskies closed the season by recording a pair of wins. Scott Burrell starred in an 85-78 triumph over Syracuse by scoring 25 points and gathering nine rebounds. The athletic junior finished eighth in the league in scoring (15.8), second in steals (2.3), and second in three-pointers per game (2.17). Teammate Chris Smith led the Big East in scoring (22.1) and three-pointers per game (2.72) and was third in three-point field goal percentage (.415).

PITTSBURGH

Pitt was the only team to finish at 9-9 in the conference, qualifying them for a seventh-place finish. The Panthers began the week by demolishing Boston College, 90-66. But they could not maintain this level of play and fell to G'town 67-57 in their finale. Pitt has been led all season by senior playmaker Sean Miller. He led the conference in assists (7.0) and free throw percentage (.927) and served as the catalyst for his squad. Pitt has a bright future with underclassmen Chris McNeal and Orlando Antigua. McNeal finished 10th in scoring (14.7), second in field goal percentage (.508), and fourth in rebounding (8.1). The Panthers most likely need to win three games in the tournament to entertain hopes of an NCAA bid.

BOSTON COLLEGE

Just two weeks ago, B.C. was 7-7 in the Big East and 15-8 overall with a good shot at making the NCAA Tournament. But an 0-4 finish leaves them in eighth place and with two chances of making the field of 64 — slim and none. The Eagles' average margin of defeat in their last two games against Pitt and UConn was 17 points. But their terrible finish aside, B.C. has had much to smile about. With a core of talented sophomores, the Eagles showed much improvement this season. Center Bill Curley continues to develop, as he finished seventh in scoring (15.9), sixth in rebounding (8.0), and second in field goal percentage (.508). B.C. led the conference in three-point goal percentage (.414) and was second in three-pointers per game (6.67). But unless they win the Big East Tournament, mark the Eagles down for the NIT.

PROVIDENCE

Providence recovered from a 1-7 start in league play to win five of its last 10. A very physical team, the Friars rebounded with a vengeance and played rugged defense, allowing their opponents a meager .406 field goal percentage. P.C. set a league precedent by outrebounding its opponent in every Big East contest this season. Newcomer Michael Smith topped the league in rebounding (11.1) and was 15th in scoring (12.7). The 6-8 sophomore combined with frontcourt mates Marques Bragg and Dickey Simpkins to dominate the inside. A young club, the Friars made many costly mistakes due to inexperience that cost them several close games. Providence could prove to be a surprise in either the Big East or NIT Tournaments.

MIAMI

The Hurricanes' initial season in the Big East proved to be a harsh adjustment for them. With a 1-17 conference mark, Miami learned how difficult it is to win in the Big East. But with an extremely young team, Miami can only get better. The Canes improved as the season progressed, taking several teams down to the wire or even into overtime. With a talented freshman class, look for Miami to make slow but steady progress. The Canes will most likely finish in the basement the next two years, but they should definitely do better than 1-17.

PLAYERS OF THE YEAR

The Big East Player of the Year is Alonzo Mourning. A unanimous selection, Mourning often dominated games on both ends of the court and carried Georgetown to a surprising share of the regular season title. Mourning led the conference in blocks (5.2) and field goal percentage (.551), was second in rebounding (10.9), fourth in scoring (20.7), and 12th in free-throw percentage (.765). The 6-foot-10 senior center is also the recipient of the Big East Defensive Player of the Year Award. He is also a candidate for several national player of the year awards.

Syracuse freshman Lawrence Moten has been named the Big East Rookie of the Year. A 6-foot-5 guard, Moten is capable of hitting from long range or putting on a dazzling move to the hoop. He ranks sixth in the conference in scoring (18.4), fourth in field goal percentage (.461), 11th in three-point goal percentage (.312) and free throw percentage (.767), 10th in three-pointers per game (1.61), and 14th in rebounding

By ALEX SCOFIELD
Staff Reporter

MIAMI

It was no surprise when the Hurricanes downed UConn at the Big East Tournament championships March 9. Miami's conquest marked the end of a season in which it went undefeated (21-0) in conference play. Equally expected was Hurricane Frances Savage's winning of the Big East Player of the Year award by a unanimous vote of the league's coaches. After rolling over Seton Hall in the first round of the tournament, Savage's tournament-record 41 points paced the Canes as they beat Providence 82-70.

CONNECTICUT

Although the Huskies held the powerful Miami squad to 56 points, they were only able to put up 47 of their own. UConn's loss in the final game left the team with a 14-7 Big East record. Rebecca Lobo was a unanimous choice as the Big East's Rookie of the Year after winning the Rookie of the Week title a record seven times. Senior guard Wendy Davis represented the Huskies on the first all-conference team.

GEORGETOWN

The Hoyas had their most successful year ever in Big East conference play. After beating Villanova in the quarterfinals, they were stopped short in the next round with an 82-64 loss to Connecticut. After their tournament play was over, the Hoyas' conference record stood at 14-6 and they placed forward Leni Wilson (9.6 rpg) and guard Kris Witfill (16.3 ppg) on the all-conference second team.

PROVIDENCE

Tracy Lis and the rest of the Providence scoring machine went down shooting in a 82-70 loss to Miami in the tournament semifinals. Lis finished her senior year with 2,485 career points, a Big East record. The Lady Friars wound up in a third-place tie with G'town as they finished the season at 14-6.

ST. JOHN'S

The fifth-seeded Express put up a valiant effort against Providence in the quarterfinals of the Big East Tournament. Although P.C. was heavily favored to win this contest, St. John's was one point away from scoring an upset, 67-66. Tina Ogden excelled defensively for the Express, finishing the season with a league-high 2.5 blocks per game.

PITTSBURGH

After committing a 70-59 mercy-killing of lowly Boston College in the first round, the Lady Panthers were slaughtered by UConn 86-50. Forward Joanna Huemrich was one bright spot for the 6-13 Pitt team and her performance landed her on the second all-Big East team.

SETON HALL

This year's edition of the Lady Pirates was a young group, headed by freshmen Dawn Johnson and Amanda Makarewicz. Although the Hall has high hopes for the upcoming seasons, it was only able to attain the eighth seed in the 1992 tournament. In the 8-9 game the Lady Pirates downed Syracuse. However, they were unable to put up a fight against Miami, losing 76-62.

SYRACUSE

The Orangewomen spent most of the season trying to avoid falling into last place in the conference. In the first round of the tourney, Seton Hall beat Syracuse 71-58. This put to rest any hopes S.U. could surprise its Big East opponents in the tournament. Junior Orangewoman Erin Kenneally excelled both on and off the court, making both the all-conference Third team and the District I Academic all-America team.

BOSTON COLLEGE

Sarah Behn (26.6 ppg, First in the Big East) and Kerry Curran shone throughout the season for the Eagles. Their play, however, was not enough to guide B.C. out of the conference cellar. The Eagles were quietly eliminated by Pitt in the first round and hope that their two returning stars will guide them to an improved record next season.

Cats face Syracuse, NCAA bid on line

By ANDY FITZPATRICK
Sports Editor

Never count out the Villanova Wildcats.

Coming off a 36-point loss at Boston College, the Cats came home to face Miami Feb. 18 with an overall record of 8-13, 5-7 in the Big East. For all practical purposes, the season appeared over.

Do not look now, fans, but the Cats are one of the hottest teams in the country, winning six consecutive Big East contests to finish the regular season at 14-13. They captured all six games by at least 10 points, including a 74-59 thrashing of first place Seton Hall, and their latest, a 76-56 blowout of Syracuse last Sunday at the Carrier Dome on CBS.

The Cats have been nothing less than magnificent during their recent surge. Case in point, the first half at Syracuse. Nothing went wrong for 'Nova. Center James Bryson set the tone early, scoring eight of the team's first 13 points to push the Cats to an early 13-6 lead. From there, the rout was on. Keyed by an aggressive defense, the Cats went on a 16-0 run to lead 31-11. Not letting up, the Cats pushed the lead out to 26 in front of a stunned national audience to go in at the break up a whopping 44-18.

The closest Syracuse came in the second half was 13, and that was because of a frenetic full-court press and questionable officiating. But, there was no beating the Cats on this day, as Anthony Pelle slammed home the team's final two points to give them a 76-56 win.

There are many different reasons for this sudden winning streak. The most important is the defensive intensity. Too many times earlier in the year the Cats would have trouble scoring easy baskets because their defense was not creating turnovers that would lead to easy baskets. It placed a constant strain on the offense to create all the shot opportunities. The new and improved Wildcats are winning once again with their trademark, defense.

Do not look now, fans, but the Cats are one of the hottest teams in the country.

A fact often forgotten during this season was that this is a veteran team. The experience has really started to show as in each game the team gains a little more confidence. Seniors Chris Walker, Greg Woodard and Marc Dowdell have sparked this resurgence with more intense play. This has enabled Lance Miller and Bryson to fill the gaps, which for Bryson has been to crash the boards and Miller to penetrate the lane.

So at 14-13 where does that leave this basketball team? Well, today 'Nova opened the Big East tournament with a rematch against the Orangemen. They will have to defeat the 'Cuse for the third time this season to keep their NCAA hopes alive and this will not be quite as easy as the first two. One of the hardest feats in college basketball is to beat the same team three times in one year. Still the Cats are streaking and the Orangemen are reeling. While 'Nova has won its last six, the Orange have dropped six of its last eight to enter the rematch at 18-9.

With a victory over Syracuse, the Cats would be 15-13 overall and would play the winner of Seton Hall vs. Providence/Boston College. A semifinal win would give the Cats eight in a row and an NCAA Tournament bid. A loss would severely harm the team's hopes and with a 15-14 record, the Cats would be right where they always are, on the bubble.

NOTES: If the Cats beat Syracuse today, they will play tomorrow at 1:30 on CBS ... Junior Lance Miller was selected to the Big East's second team ... Since the National Championship season of 1985, the Cats have gone to the NCAA's four of the last six years ... If the Cats could put their first six league games and their last six together, they would have gone 11-1 in the Big East. Unfortunately, they dropped six in the middle.

Women capture Big East

By BOB TRAVISANO

"Finally. This is my fourth year on the team and I've been second for three years. It was good to win."

These words by Eileen Consadine echo the overall elation of the women's swim team after it captured the Big East Meet title and dethroned Pitt, the champs for the last 11 years. In a hard-fought victory, the women beat second place Miami by 42 points and third place Pitt by nearly 100 points.

The men also capitalized in the Big East Meet by placing second behind Pitt. The Cats finished second for the second straight year and the eighth time in 11 years.

Finally. This is my fourth year on the team and I've been second for three years. It was good to win.
Eileen Consadine

Lisa Flood was named the Outstanding Woman Performer for the second year in a row. Her wins in the 100-yard breaststroke, 200-yard breaststroke, and 200-yard individual medley merited the award. Mary Dowlingg also won in the 1650-yard freestyle and freshman Meaghan McMafferey beat out the pack in the 50 Free.

Other noteworthy performances were displayed, including Dowling's second place finish in the 500-yard free, the 200-yard medley relay of Amy Ryan, Flood, Michell Pulaski and Sarah Dykstra and Amy Burton's third in the 100-yard breaststroke.

The men also had several performances in defeat. The 200-yard medley relay team placed first. Rob Drumm placed second in the 500-yard free, Scott Fraser took third in the 100-yard butterfly, Mike Bagshaw finished second in the 100-yard breaststroke and Ed Paradise swam to second in the 200-yard breaststroke.

Going into the last day of the three day event, the women were a little behind with their best events yet to come. According to Consadine, it was right where Coach Chuck Horton wanted and expected them to be. Horton was named the Women's Coach of the Year for the second straight year.

The Cats seem poised to repeat again next year with many swimmers returning.

"We only have two graduating seniors, so we are a young team. All eighteen team members scored at the meet," said Consadine.

Lady Cats ousted

By ED WASIELEWSKI

Up and down. Back and forth. Win one, lose one.

The rollercoaster season is over. Head Coach Harry Perretta's Lady Cats ended their season with a first round loss to Georgetown in the Big East Tournament in typical fashion. Unable to maintain consistent play for 40 minutes, 'Nova endured its final frustration in a season marred by frustrating defeats.

"We played pretty well in the second half [of the season]," said Perretta. "We were picked to finish ninth and we ended up tied for fifth place. If we had made a couple of free throws, we could have gone .500 [in Big East play] for the season."

The Cats (11-17) started the season by dropping three of their first four games before rallying to win consecutive Big 5 contests against Temple and LaSalle. But the 1991-92 season would not go easy for Perretta, the winningest active coach in the Big East. A heartbreaking 57-56 loss to Siena in the opening round of the Wildcat Tournament proved to be an ominous sign for the Cats.

Entering conference play with a 3-5 record, 'Nova eked by Syracuse 53-51 Jan. 3. After this win, the Cats would not taste victory for nearly three weeks. Despite piling up the losses, Perretta and the Cats remained close in every game with their greatest margin of defeat being just 10 points. Included amongst this six-game January drought was a home contest against the lowly Boston College Eagles which the Cats lost 64-56.

After the game, captain Justine Chaverini walked off the team. Without the senior point guard leading the attack, there was a noticeable change in the team's play.

"After Justine left, the others knew they had to do more," said Perretta. "Justine played a lot of minutes and with her leaving, it freed up more minutes for the other players. Everyone realized they had to play better."

One of those players who stepped up her game was freshman Michele Thornton, a unanimous selection to the Big East All-Rookie team. Thornton averaged 12.2 points and 4.3 assists per game while establishing several Big East freshman records.

Another significant contributor was forward Sheri Walker. The junior improved her numbers

'Never say never' Cats look to pull it out again

By TOM COLLINS
Editor in Chief

It seems like deja vu. It seems like deja vu. For the past three years, the Villanova Wildcats have given their best effort to repeat history with thrilling March winning streaks in pursuit of an NCAA bid.

In 1989-90, the Cats won five of their last seven games to finish at 18-14 and just squeak into the tourney with a No. 12 seed position before falling in the first round to L.S.U.

But that heartstopping, frantic finish was not enough. The Cats wanted to perform an encore. And they did. In what might be considered the basketbook roller-coaster ride of a lifetime, the Cats put the "Wild" into its name in 1990-91.

They entered the Big East Tournament battered and bruised both physically and mentally, losing their last three games to finish the season 14-13 and needing at least two wins inthe conference tourney to once again enter the NCAAs. Also, the Cats had to play the dreaded 8-9 game against lowly B.C. At a school where basketball excellence is expected, 'Nova was at a low point.

For most of the game against the Eagles, 'Nova played dreadfully before erasing a 10-point deficit with two minutes to go and winning, 74-73, on a pair of free throws by Lance Miller with one second remaining.

True to form, the Cats upstaged themselves in their next outing with a remarkable 70-68 comeback win over Syracuse to seal their postseason fate. They trailed by 16 with eight minutes to go in the game. They won. They made the tournament.

Once again in 1991-92, 'Nova is trying to produce another miraculous late season run and eke their way into the tourney. For most colleges, an NCAA tournament bid is an honor. At Villanova, both fans and players expect it.

The Cats are streaking with six straight victories, including a 76-56 blowout of Syracuse and an equally impressive win over Pitt. 'Nova is rolling and primed for another tournament bid. Three weeks ago, postseason was the furthest thing from the Cats' minds as they suffered a dreadful and pitifully unemotional 36-point loss to Boston College. The Cats were no longer fighting for the Big East crown but for survival. Their record stood at 8-13, including six straight losses.

In a year the Cats expected to flourish, they floundered in mediocrity and mired themselves in inconsistency. They began the season horribly at 0-3 and 2-6. They remarkably rebounded to 6-6, then fell to 8-13 before finishing 14-13. They started the conference season 5-1 and ended it with a 6-0 run, but they were 0-6 in the middle. They beat both Seton Hall and the 'Cuse twice, but lost to Hawaii. They crushed Temple and Connecticut, but fell to LaSalle and Providence.

But, this weekend, the Cats can end the frustration of a disappointing season and insure their postseason dreams with a strong showing once again at the Big East Tournament. With wins over Syracuse and the Seton Hall-Providence/Boston College winner, 'Nova guarantees itself a spot among the nation's 64 elite teams. With only one win the Cats are on the bubble. No wins and they are out.

Day of Diversity held

By CHRISTA MRUZ
Staff Reporter

Campaign for Community sponsored a University Awareness Day March 16 in order to promote diversity on campus.

The day provided an array of discussions by faculty members on subjects including politics and foreign readings and ended with a Step Show by Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity.

Last year in response to comments on a lack of diversity on campus former Student Government President Kerry Stromberg formed a group called A Year of Diversity. Throughout the summer, the group met and decided their focus on creating awareness about diversity should be year-long. They changed their name to Campaign for Community at the beginning of the 1991-92 school year. The group is comprised of 11 Steering Committee members and subcommittees.

Katie Roberts, the group's chairperson, expressed the difficulties of starting a new organization. "It was hard to get support from the faculty, funding and publicity," said Roberts.

Dobbin speaks on campus issues

By TOM COLLINS
Editor in Chief

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, spoke to the Villanovan March 16 in an exclusive interview. Dobbin discussed the events of the past four months and the direction Villanova is headed. Topics included west campus development, endownment, the new core curriculum, downsizing and multiculturalism.

What is the general state of the University and what improvements are being made?

"I think the University is in great shape as it faces its sesquicentennial year. I am very optimistic about the whole year and the process being a festive one that celebrates what the University stands for, its values. The plans are coming along very well and we're all looking forward to the feast of St. Thomas of Villanova on Sept. 22. On the eve of that day we will rededicate the St. Thomas Chapel. Then the next day we will have the dedication of the new Liberal Arts Center on the campus. We have a lot of things going on during our 150th year that I think the students, the faculty and everybody will be excited about.

"Another thing that I feel pleased and optimistic about, which will be considered strange given the economy, is the capital campaign. The Board of Trustees officially launched the campaign in December. They approved what they call the 'silent phase' of the campaign. Usually, for about a year, fundraisers try to raise leadership gifts. Before they publicly announce the campaign, they come up with a tentative target and if they raise 40 to 50 percent of the target, they announce publicly the goal of the program. What we would like to do during the sesquicentennial year is launch the captial campaign for $100 million or more. If the leadership goes well, which it has done, we are optimistic that we can make that amount. Right now we have pledges of over $15 million. So things are moving along.

"Students might be interested in one part of [the capital campaign]. We are looking at raising $32 million for endowment. We have already raised $7.2 million in two years. And of that $7.2 million, $6 million is already in, in cash. What that will do, especially when we get the full amount, is provide relief from the tuition dependency for the University. There is a great deal of positive attitude toward the University.

"We are setting up a Steering Committee of prominent figures who will provide the leadership for the campaign. We're looking for 17 or 18 people and 14 spots have already been filled. To me, it is a sign that most people feel positively about the University.

"Part of the education process in the leadership part of this campaign is letting people know that endowment is our main priority. The University has approved the Strategic Plan and now we know very specifically what our priorities are. And endowment is one."

How has the recession affected prospective students' applications to the University? Also, is the recession affecting the University in other areas?

"We do not see a noticeable impact of the recession. I would say the biggest impact on admissions is demographic decline. There are fewer students in high schools throughout the country so that is the main reason for less applications this year. But Villanova, although the number of applicants have declined like the rest of the nation, has not been hurt in terms of selectivity for the student body.

"The demographics is one of the reasons why we have decided to downsize enrollment, to keep the quality strong. But there is another reason. Another concern we have is that, if endowment is

Elizabeth Cady Stanton winners receive awards

By ELIZABETH BARSZCZEWSKI
Assistant News Editor

The women's studies department hosted the presentation of the Elizabeth Cady Stanton Research Awards March 18. This year's award presentation marks the third consecutive year that the awards have been presented to students who have done an exemplary job researching a gender-related issue.

The Elizabeth Cady Stanton Research Awards recognize the achievements of students on both the undergraduate and graduate levels. This year the award for research done by an undergraduate student was presented to Jennifer Holefelder, a junior mathematics major.

Holefelder's research paper, titled "Emmy Noether," dealt with the problems that the female mathematician faced as a woman trying to succeed in her chosen field. Holefelder's research chronicled her upbringing, educational background and professional career as a mathematician.

"I've always been interested in math," Holefelder said. "I was really impressed with all the presentations today," she added. Holefelder also said that she would like to pursue a career in secondary school education.

The Elizabeth Cady Stanton Research Award for research done by a graduate student was presented to Laura D. Russell, a teacher at Episcopal Academy in Merion, Pa. Russell presented a research paper titled "Women in Leadership: Power Redefined."

The inspiration for her research came to Russell when reading an article in Fortune magazine which featured the experiences of women who had come up against the "glass ceiling," the point at which it seems impossible for women in business to advance any further in their careers, Russell said.

In doing her research, Russell also found advice offered to women which instructed them to be more "like the boys" and learn "sport-speak" in order to become more well equipped to communicate with their male counterparts in the business world, she said.

> Women bring so many valuable qualities to business and leadership positions.
> Laura D. Russell

"I started to ask myself, 'why do I have to be like a boy to succeed'," Russell said.

"Women bring so many valuable qualities to business and leadership positions. Their qualities should be used more," said Russell.

The research submitted by the students was judged according to originality, creativity, how well the student's point was argued and if the student utilized the most recent information which applied to their topic, said Dr. Barbara Wall, O.P., director for the Center for Peace and Justice.

The competition is open to topics in any field but must be related to issues of gender, Wall said.

"The quality of papers has gotten significantly better over the years. It was very difficult to make a choice as to whom the awards should go," said Wall.

Activists mobilize support for opposing viewpoints

By LARISA EPATKO

The abortion debate continues to raise controversy around the country as people show their support for pro-life and pro-choice positions through marches, rallies and distributed literature.

March has been designated as "Women's History Month" in an attempt to promote multicultural women's history throughout the year, said Mary Ruthsdotter, project director of the National Women's History Project.

The theme that will be celebrated across the country is "Women's History: A Patchwork of Many Lives." The 1992 poster features 42 women who have contributed to women's history.

Among the women honored in the quilt's design are Amelia Earhart, the first woman to fly solo across the Atlantic Ocean; Coretta Scott King, a civil rights and peace activist; Georgia O'Keeffe, a contemporary artist; and Susan B. Anthony, a leader of the early women's rights movement.

"We want to have women's history talked about just as much as men's," said Ruthsdotter. "There is an enormous amount of women's history.

"The program takes place every year and is growing like prairie fire," Ruthsdotter said. "The incident with Clarence Thomas and Anita Hill, and the two significant rape trials [Mike Tyson and William Kennedy Smith] brought more attention to women's issues, including women's history."

Women's History Month is held in March because March 8 is International Women's Day, said Ruthsdotter.

"In 1992, women constitute over half of the population, yet hold only two of 100 U.S. Senate seats, three of 50 governor offices, 6 percent of the seats in the U.S. House and 9.5 percent of the Pennsylvania state legislature," according to information from the

TEHRAN, Iran

Armenian and Azeri negotiators reportedly agreed to a cease-fire in the 4-year-old conflict over the Nagorno-Karabakh region March 15. Amid talks of peace, however, ethnic violence continued.

If the agreement is honored, "a very good opportunity would be brought about for a lasting peace," said Iranian Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Velayati.

U.N. envoy Cyrus Vance traveled to Nagorno-Karabakh March 16 to mediate the truce. International efforts to settle the dispute have increased in recent months after the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

KINGSTON, Jamaica

Jamaican Prime Minister Michael Manley announced he would resign March 28 due to poor health. He has undergone five operations in recent years, including surgery for prostate cancer. His resignation marks the end of the family political dynasty that led Jamaica to independence.

Manley, 67, said the ruling People's National Party would meet March 28 to select a new party leader.

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia

The United Nations officially established the U.N. Transitional Authority in Cambodia in hopes of ending two decades of war that have killed countless Cambodians and devastated their homeland.

"UNTAC will be the largest, most complicated, most ambitious and, I am afraid, most expensive operation in the 47-year history of the United Nations," said senior U.N. diplomat Yasushi Akashi.

U.N. officials and soldiers began arriving in October after the Vietnamese-installed government and three rebel factions signed a peace agreement to end 13 years of civil war.

The lightly armed U.N. military force is to disarm most of the 250,000 fighters from Cambodia's four rival factions and is to ensure that all Vietnamese soldiers are out of the country.

ISTANBUL, Turkey

The leadership of the world's 300 million Orthodox Christians decided to limit a 20-year-old dialogue with the Vatican because of a dispute over the Roman Catholic activities in Eastern Europe March 15.

The Orthodox Church says the Vatican is using Eastern Rite Catholic Church members, also called Uniates, to extend its influence in Russia and Eastern Europe. The Orthodox Church is the largest church in that area.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

Just minutes before the strike deadline, SEPTA General Manager Louis J. Gambaccini announced the details of a contract with 5,149 members of Transport Workers Union Local 234.

Both sides moved away from their rock-hard positions of no compromise on the three key issues of wages, pensions and health benefits.

Harry Lombardo, president of Local 234, said what turned negotiations around was simple. A strike would have been catastrophic for everyone, he said. A strike would have left 450,000 Philadelphians without their usual transportation.

NEW YORK, NY

Villanova Wildcats missed making the NCAA field for the second time in the last four years but received a bid to the National Invitation Tournament (NIT).

Villanovans for Life hold annual award ceremony

By LARISA EPATKO
News Editor

Villanovans for Life presented Helen Alvare, pro-life spokeswoman for the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB), with the Respect for Human Life award for her work in the pro-life effort March 17 in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center.

"Villanova University has a long history of a pro-life tradition," said Kristen Haaf, president of Villanovans for Life and presenter of the award.

Haaf said Alvare is "someone we can look at and follow as an example, because if we think it [the pro-life effort] is hard on campus, wait until we go out in the real world."

Alvare is a 1981 graduate of the Commerce and Finance College of the Univeristy. She graduated from Cornell Law School and presently is director of planning and information for the NCCB Secretariat for pro-life activities.

The public is "almost uniformly in support of legal abortion," Alvare said. The debate on abortion has gotten meanspirited over the years, she added.

Political bodies at the federal level are afraid to support the pro-life movement, but state representatives, like in Pennsylvania, have the courage to pass laws that the public wants, Alvare said.

"A poll showed that 60 percent of Americans tolerate abortion only for rape, incest and endangerment of the mother's life," said Alvare. Only 1 percent of abortions are performed for those reasons, she added.

Alvare said that 73 percent of Americans would not tolerate abortion after the first trimester of pregnancy. However, Roe v. Wade, the Jan. 22, 1973 Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion, allows abortion during all nine months, she said.

About 80 percent of the media polled strongly agreed with legal abortion, said Alvare.

"The media attempts to create a specific look about who the prolifer is, and it cannot be a woman ... [although] empirically, woman are more pro-life than men," Alvare said. The truth of the fact cannot be changed by the person who voices it, she added.

Alvare travels around the country and visits universities, educating people about the NCCB stand on abortion practice and policy.

Alvare said survival of the pro-life movement amid the increase of support for legal abortion over the last few years is "truly remarkable."

The National Right to Life was founded because there are more people supporting pro-life than they know how to put to good use, said Alvare.

"I have heart because pro-life has always been strong and a visceral part of American culture," Alvare said.

However, two aspects of the pro-life, pro-choice debate are disturbing, said Alvare.

The first are the moral questions of what the value of life is, and how the fetus' rights balance against the mother's, Alvare said.

The second disturbing aspect, according to Alvare, is the negative connotation attached to feminism since it has been associated with abortion.

U.S. News releases latest rankings of grad schools

By JENNIFER CASTELLI

The University was not included in any of the top 25 U.S. News & World Report's national rankings of graduate school programs. The issue, titled "America's Best Graduate Schools," was released March 16.

The magazine has ranked engineering, law, medical and business graduate schools for three years. This is the first year that the publication has ranked graduate programs in liberal arts.

Yale University was chosen as the top-ranked law school in the nation for the third straight year, according to the magazine. Of the 175 law schools accredited by the American Bar Association, Yale was followed by Harvard University, Stanford University, the University of Chicago and Columbia University.

The publication chose the University of California at Berkeley and Yale University as the top graduate English programs.

For the third year in a row, Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) was named the top engineering graduate school in the nation. Schools with fewer than 20 students enrolled in their engineering programs were not included in the survey. Also, the University of California at Santa Barbara and Arizona State University are the "top up-and-coming engineering schools," according to the magazine's report.

Stanford University headed the rankings as the top-ranked business school in the nation for the second time in three years. For the first time, the rankings included executive-education business programs. Harvard University was chosen as the best graduate school in this area.

In addition, the magazine chose Stanford University, the University of Chicago and MIT as the top graduate economics programs.

Harvard University also led the list of the 60 accredited U.S. medical schools in the nation for the third year in a row, followed by Johns Hopkins University, Duke University, the University of California at San Francisco and Yale University.

In psychology, Stanford University was chosen as having the best graduate school program and the University of California at Berkeley was chosen as the No. 1 graduate school for history.

Also, the University of California at Berkeley was chosen as the top-ranked political science program and the University of Wisconsin at Madison headed the list of top graduate sociology schools.

Greeks promote area clean-up

By LARISA EPATKO

Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity and Villanova Environmental Group (VEG) organized at least six fraternities and six sororities to collect garbage from areas in Bryn Mawr March 21 from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m.

Bob Downs, philanthropy chairperson of Sigma Phi Epsilon, said the purposes of sorority and fraternity involvement in the clean-up were to assist VEG, improve the Greek system's image and advance interfraternity and sorority relationships.

Media coverage of the event will let residents of the area "see everyone together wearing their letters," Downs said.

Over 100 students are involved in the clean-up with 15 to 20 members from each fraternity and sorority participating, said Downs.

Zeta Psi, FIJI, Alpha Tau Omega, Alpha Phi Delta, Lambda Chi Alpha, Delta Tau Delta and Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternities are participating in the event.

Kappa Alpha Theta, Pi Beta Phi, Delta Gamma, Alpha Chi Omega, Delta Delta Delta and Chi Omega sororities also will take part in the day.

"VEG asked for a group to do the clean-up every Saturday, and I saw this as an opportunity to get as many sororities and fraternities involved as we could," said Downs.

Daryl Fernandez, a member of VEG, is in charge of the event, Downs added.

The clean-up will take place in the area surrounding the Bryn Mawr Trust bank, said Downs.

Sigma Phi Epsilon has participated in a Walk-A-Thon and other activities for its philanthropy, but this is the first time it has done the clean-up with VEG, according to Downs.

The students will meet in the parking lot next to Main Lot at 9:45 a.m. Saturday.

"Everyone I've talked to seems really excited about it," Downs said.

University rape counselor assists students in need

By JILL CALLAHAN
Staff Reporter

There were four reported rapes, resulting in three arrests at the University last year. Two have been reported this year, said Tracey Hentz, investigator for Public Safety. Hentz was hired this year to deal with reports of sexual assaults and rape.

"Rape is a problem everywhere, especially college campuses, and unfortunately Villanova is not immune to it," said Hentz.

Through the Department of Public Safety, several presentations have been made throughout the year, mainly in female dorms. Educating women seems to be a contributor in minimizing the number of sexual assaults, but the men also need to be educated, said Hentz.

If a student has been raped at Villanova, he or she is encouraged to report the crime as soon as possible to Public Safety, said Hentz. Hentz will then guide the student in the steps that should be taken in dealing with the incident and escort the student where he or she needs to go.

A victim of rape should immediately seek medical care, said Hentz. This should be done to see if any injuries have occurred and to collect physical evidence in case the student decides to press charges later, she said.

The victim should not take a shower or destroy anything that relates to the rape before the incident is reported.

All information is confidential within the University but it must be understood that when the victim is brought to the hospital, the police are contacted to speak to the victim, Hentz said. This does not mean that the victim has to press charges, but a record of the incident will exist, Hentz added.

The University would like it if students would get involved in peer counseling and support groups, especially male students, said Hentz.

"The men are the ones who rape. They need to listen to the women when they say no, and the women need to be firm when they say it," she said.

A majority of rape incidents occur when drugs or alcohol are involved, Hentz said. Freshmen are a high-risk group because they are away from home for the first time and they want to meet people and be liked, she said. For these reasons, some students are careless in their decisions, she added.

"Come to us when needed, we'll do whatever we need to do and give you our support," Hentz said.

Project Sunshine raises funds for Sunshine Day

By KRISTIN BRIGGS

Project Sunshine held its ninth annual fast during all lunches March 12. The money donated by students for skipping their lunches will benefit Sunshine Day.

Sunshine Day consists of a carnival hosted by all agencies where Project Sunshine members volunteer.

The fast raised $3,574 from the 1,787 students who gave up their lunches. Project Sunshine received $2 for each student who gave up lunch for the cause. There has been an increase in participants every year since the program began nine years ago. The increase "enables us to make Sunshine Day better every year," said Sister Therese Wenzel, director of Project Sunshine.

Project Sunshine sends volunteers out weekly to tutor at six different agencies: Southwest Community Center, Hickman Day Care, St. Rose of Lima School, Catholic Worker Children from North Philadelphia, Our Mother of Sorrows School and Francis de Sales School. The children at the centers are brought to Villanova on the day.

The money raised from fasting has enabled amusement rides to be available to the children at the carnival. The money also benefited the creation of a grand prize award and seven cartoon character costumes: The Three Bears, Mickey Mouse, the Amazing Elf, Easter Rabbit and Fireman's Shaggy Dog.

Sunshine Day will be held April 11 from 10 a.m. until 3 p.m. Project Sunshine welcomes all new and past volunteers. Sign up is in the Project Sunshine office on the first floor in Tolentine Hall.

Dining Services is celebrating National Nutrition Month by offering special promotions.

Dining Nutrition Month celebrated

By PATRICK WHITE
Staff Reporter

The American Dietetic Association declared March National Nutrition Month.

The program has been at the University for years. The 1992 slogan is "Eat Right America." The goal of the month is "to inform the public of nutritional trends and to explain the health value of foods in an attempt to make our lives healthier based on what we eat," said Mary McKenzie, acting director of Food Services.

The emphasis of National Nutrition Month will be on Wednesdays. Each Wednesday, Food Services will feature a different program for three weeks. The three programs will cover bread and spread, a garnishing demonstration and yogurt. Prizes will also be awarded to promote the activities.

Winners will receive items including cash prizes, sports bags and watches and bicycles donated by the Dannon Yogurt company.

There are also activities sponsored by the Food Services outside of the dining halls. A Health Fair for faculty and staff was held in the Connelly Center offering such services as mammograms and blood pressure and cholesterol tests.

University Senate to discuss basketball tickets, Fall Break

By TOM COLLINS
Editor in Chief

The lowering of student basketball tickets, the maintenance of Fall Break and an improved University telecommunications system will be among the topics discussed at the University Senate Meeting to be held March 27, according to Student Government President Mark O'Rourke.

The proposal of a reduction in basketball ticket prices is the result of growing disservice to the student body, said O'Rourke. He cited annual price increases, expensive Spectrum Big Five games and inadequate transportation to Spectrum games. The goal of the proposal is to cut the season package to $100, added O'Rourke.

Student Government will present its proposal to the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president; Dr. Theodore Aceto, athletic director; and the Athletic Advisory Board in hopes of implementation by next year, the 1992-93 basketball season.

"I think the administration exploits the student demand for tickets," said O'Rouke. "As a result, they increase ticket prices every year. At places like Syracuse the prices are drastically lower than here.

"They already make a killing with alumni seats. I don't think they need to take advantage of the students. They don't tailor [the prices] to the student. I think $100 would be perfect. It is not an arbitrary figure. It seems reasonable," O'Rourke said.

In 1988, the price of season tickets was $85. Every year since then the prices have been raised an average of $15 per year. The 1991-92 season ticket plan cost the student $130 for 14 games, including two exhibition games and four Spectrum games.

In comparison, Georgetown, a Big East Conference member, charges $75 for student season tickets. All of its games are played at the Capital Centre, which hosts professional sports teams like the National Basketball Association's (NBA) Washington Bullets and the National Hockey League's (NHL) Washington Capitals.

The main problems with this season's package were the exhibition schedule, home contests' conflict with student breaks and the Spectrum Big Five prices, according to O'Rourke. Of the 14 contests, five took place during break periods. The St. John's, Seton Hall and Connecticut games occurred over Christmas Break. The Pittsburgh and Providence games were played during Spring Break.

The Spectrum games also unfairly caused ticket price increase, said O'Rourke. When the University canceled the round-robin Big Five format in June 1991, it agreed to play two city opponents annually at the Spectrum in doubleheader format. This year's game tickets cost $20 each.

In comparison, the Big East Tournament doubleheader games tickets cost $10. The charge for the Georgetown and Syracuse, bith single Big East contests held at the Spectrum, were $10.

The Fall Break is also a priority for Student Government, said O'Rourke.

The concern stems from the current debate between three factions of the University, students, faculty and administration. Student Government wants to maintain the current week-long Fall Break. Faculty wants classes to begin after Labor Day. Administration instituted a 14-week semester instead of the present 13-week period.

If Fall Break is maintained, classes must begin during the last week of August due to the extended semester. If classes begin after Labor Day and the semester is 14 weeks, Fall Break will be eliminated.

"It would be detrimental to the students if they lose their Fall Break," said O'Rourke. "If it was cut, there would only be a Thanksgiving break before the end of the semester. That would be too long."

Due to a 1982 University Senate ruling that permanently instituted Fall Break, a vote may not occur in the March 27 hearing, said O'Rourke. The ruling stipulated that the University would begin classes after Labor Day when possible. With the 14-week semester, classes cannot begin after Labor Day.

"It's already been voted on that we'll be going to a 14-week semester," O'Rourke said. "Since we've already voted on the Fall Break [in 1982], we will be starting a week earlier."

The new 14-week semester will not begin until the 1993-94 academic year.

Telecommunications will be an important issue at the Senate meeting, O'Rourke said. Recommendations by Student Government call for "telephone and computer access to be made available as soon as possible in individual rooms in residence halls that are currently lacking such facilities;" and "An emergency phone system should be installed at strategic locations throughout the University's campus immediately," according to a Student Government report.

The proposal was passed 11-0 at a government meeting March 11.

"One of the highest priorities on campus is safety," O'Rourke said.

Notice

In order to have 13 class days (spring semester 1992) for the Undergraduate Day School courses, it will be necessary for Tuesday, April 21, to follow a Thursday class schedule and Wednesday, April 22, to follow a Friday class schedule.

University President discusses multiculturalism, facilities

going to be the top priority, we are not going to have a lot of money to put into new buildings. So what we will do is refurbish what we have, and rightsize the University to the campus size we have.

"The only big exception we will make is the residence halls on west campus, which we are now in the midst of planning. Now we are in the phase of receiving proposals from builders to design and construct new halls. If everything goes according to plan, they will be ready in 1994, when the incoming freshman class will be juniors. It is our hope that the incoming freshman class will be able to live on-campus for four years.

"If we had adequate housing on-campus, how many students would still prefer to live off-campus with freedom? That's something nobody can give an absolute reading on. In our Strategic Plan, we are aiming at 70 percent of the total undergraduate student body living on-campus. Included in that denominator is local students living at home. If we add 625 beds, which is what we envision for the west campus, we think we will be able to house the students who want to live on-campus for four years. There will always be about 1,000 students living off-campus."

Was downsizing solely a decision based on the demographics of high schools throughout the nation? Or were there other factors?

"It was a combination of things. The first one was the one I mentioned before, the desire to rightsize the student body for the facilities that we have rather than investing in added classroom and library space. We will attempt to renovate the facilities that we have and put the added money that we have into the endowment, with the exception of west campus.

"The reason for building residence halls is that they tend to generate revenue. Over a period of time, they would pay off what the University invested into them."

What are your feelings on the new core curriculum to be instituted for the Class of 1996? Why did the changes occur and do you believe it will help improve the intellectual atmosphere at the University?

"The various departments were involved in this process and it took two years of planning. We agreed it is a priority that Villanova has always kept a strong core curriculm. Somewhat conservatively, Villanova has kept a basic core program and has benefited from it.

"But I believe the core curriculum needs more rigor and more connectivity. I think students, especially now that teachers are highly specialized in their disciplines, cannot connect material they are learning in one class to another. One of the plans in the core curriculm is to build in more connections and a more rigorous curriculum. Students are not simply coming to school and taking general studies courses similar to their high school courses. What we would like to do is bring students and challenge them right from the start.

Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, University president

The multiculturalism debate of last semester has died down recently but raised important issues of debate. Do you believe it helped increase awareness throughout the University community about the mission of the University?

"I don't know exactly how the students responded to the debate. But the debate, as it was initiated, was initiated on false premises. There were some misunderstandings, so it began in a very negative way. The debate that ensued in the Villanovan and other groups in the University did broaden people's understanding.

"There was more to that [the debate]. To understand other cultures is extremely important. As we go further in improving each college and their curricula, we will see the discussion is not over. We will see that it is stereotyped by two extremes and a lot of people in the world outside academia see a war going on which really isn't taking place. It is not the type of thing that is over or should be over. The issues of identity and multicultural understanding are ones we have to address.

"My remarks in the Villanovan cited the problem where people perceived a complete incongruity between being a Catholic institution and being interested in other cultures and differences. I don't see that at all."

The Presidential Task Force on Diversity released its report in January saying that the University is a white, Catholic university that often stereotypes ethnic and social groups apathetically. How can such faults be overcome?

"I believe the report itself offered many positive answers. It has to be done on so many different levels. It has to be done with the curriculum, Student Life, Campus Ministry. I think all areas of the University have become much more sensitized to the issue with various types of programming. The Campaign for Community had a full day for awareness. Those things are just excellent. I just hope the student body takes them seriously and I am sure a certain percentage of them do. The difficult thing is to get people to be more overt to the activities offered. We are dealing with a problem that is in our society, not just Villanova. But Villanova is committed to creating a broader sense of community open to diverse viewpoints."

Many students have voiced concern over inadequate athletic facilities for students. For example, in the Feb. 14 and Feb. 22 issues of the Villanovan two students elaborated on the bad weight training facilities. Also, when the Liberal Arts Center was constructed, the facilities behind Corr were deconstructed. Thirteen months later, they have not been replaced. Do you see this as a problem, and if so, what is being done?

"Right from the start, we intended to replace the tennis courts and basketball courts. The construction will begin within another couple of months. On west campus, there is a load of space to build facilities. That will be ideal, especially when the dorms are finished.

"The problem is not as broad as it appears. The weight room has been a problem due to old parts. We are aware of the problems. But in general, the athletic facilities are excellent."

University of Vermont students call for diversity

By College Press Service

Racial and ethnic differences divide many college communities, but the University of Vermont campus has the opposite problem — students and administrators are warring over its lack of diversity.

Many students complain that the university has not done enough to attract minority and foreign students and that students are being denied a "global education that comes with diversity.

The protests resulted in a three-week occupation of the university president's office in April 1991 and a hunger strike by two students earlier this year. A spokeman for the administration dismissed the students' actions as a "media event," and insisted the university was doing its best to increase the number of foreign and minority students.

Minorities make up 5.2 percent of the 11,000-member student body at the college on the shores of Lake Champlain. The state of Vermont has a 98.5 percent white population.

"There is unrest and general frustration on both sides," said John Commers, 18, a history major and assistant news editor for the student newspaper, the Vermont Cynic.

The diversity issue has fueled a series of demonstrations, some near-violent, over the past year that have marred an otherwise peaceful campus.

"I feel like the word 'diversity' has become a buzzword, but the unrest is growing. A lot of state residents feel like this is a state university, and there is nothing wrong with it representing the state population; others see it differently," Commers said.

The university recently released a report on the school's work in achieving ethnic diversity, but it received mixed reviews from students.

Two students, Karl Jagbandhansingh and Pamela Smith, engaged in a three-week hunger strike in January to protest the university's response to the problem.

"It was a media event," said Nick Marro, director of university public relations.

"This is a handful of very unhappy individuals," Marro said. "Clearly, over the past four or five years, the school has made a conscious effort to increase numbers, and progress has been made, but it's not as rapid as some individuals would like to see."

Marro said the administration did not disagree that students have a right to be offered opportunities to learn on a global level and said the administration was "trying to do all that it can" to promote diversity.

"This disagreement is numbers and how fast we can do this," he said.

Senior student dies in car accident

By KRISTIN JULASON
Senior Reporter

Joseph Andiario, 21, a senior accounting major at the University, died early Sunday morning as the result of injuries suffered from a car accident in Folcroft, Pa.

"It's such a shame, a guy that was a senior and was going to graduate. His life had all this promise," said Jenny O'Rourke, Andiario's cousin and a freshman at Villanova.

"We'll remember him and his whole family. They all sing Irish songs and they are all really funny. In fact, one of the reasons I came to Villanova was because of him. Last year during Homecoming Weekend, I came here with my parents and he gave me a small tour. He was just so friendly and outgoing.

"His mother, father and sister all went to Villanova and they all had great things to say about it. They are just really a Villanova tradition," O'Rourke said.

Andiario and another passenger were killed instantly when the 1991 Jeep Wrangler in which they were traveling lost control at 40 mph and flipped over on its roof at approximately 3:25 a.m. March 15, according to the county medical examiner's office. Police said Andiario was seated on a hump in the back seat. Neither victim was wearing a seatbelt.

The driver and a third passenger were listed in guarded condition at Crozer-Chester Medical Center.

The four men had been part of a group that paid to rent a bus to take them to a bachelor party in South Jersey. They were returning to their homes after the bus dropped them off in a Glenolden parking lot when the accident occurred. Folcroft Police Chief Theodore Pastore said alcohol was a factor in the crash.

The 10 p.m. Mass in the University Chapel the day of the accident was dedicated to Andiario, who was to participate in commencement exercises on May 7, 1992. Andiario was a 1988 graduate of St. James High School in Chester, Pa.

Public Safety discrepancies found in accident account

By JENNIFER CASTELLI
News Editor

Norman Wallace, assistant director of Residence Hall Security, admitted he drove a campus security car into a mud puddle on South Campus Jan. 30, contrary to an original report published in the Villanovan Feb. 14.

The article stated that an unnamed Public Safety officer caused the accident. As a result, two anonymous Public Safety officers alleged that Wallace was driving the vehicle at the time of the accident.

"It is a well-known fact that within the department [Public Safety] that Mr. Wallace was driving that vehicle and many of us are upset that he refused to accept responsibility for his actions," said an unnamed officer on duty at that time.

If it had been an officer driving the car he or she "would have been fired," an anonymous Public Safety officer said.

However, Wallace did admit March 16 to being the driver of the car.

"I am being victimized by this anonymous 'whisper-down-the-lane' activity. This matter was investigated by a number of people both externally and internally. And yes, I was embarrassed," said Wallace.

No harm was done to any student or the vehicle, said Wallace. "There is no scandal here ... Certainly, people are actively campaigning against me and I am aware of that," he said.

The incident occurred at approximately 2:30 a.m. Jan. 30 when Wallace's Public Safety vehicle got stuck in the mud behind Stanford Hall after he allegedly saw students whom he thought were involved in criminal activity. The driver "wanted to get a better look" at the students, said Jeffrey Horton, director of Public Safety, in the Feb. 14 article.

No citations for student wrongdoing were reported as a result of the incident.

Counseling center offers assistance

By MEGHAN SIMONSON
Staff Reporter

The University offers students with any problems concerning alcohol and drugs a center for assistance on the ground floor of Stanford Hall. The counselors are trained professionals and student peer educators.

"There is a serious problem with drugs and alcohol at Villanova. This is due to the fact that a majority of the students' attitudes are that a social life must revolve around the use of drugs and alcohol," said Janice Janosik, director of the Center for Alcohol and Drug Assistance.

The center's purpose is to be there for the students, Janosik said. It is not there to take away their alcohol, she added.

Students can sit down with a counselor and take an objective look at their problems before it becomes a habitual dependency. The Center stresses to students that they can talk about their problems confidentially, said Janosik.

Counselors are available at the Center Monday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. identified disciplines with the largest graduate enrollment in the liberal arts. These programs included economics, English, history, political science, psychology and sociology. The magazine then surveyed department heads and directors of graduate studies at schools granting five or more doctoral degrees in any one of these disciplines between 1986 and 1990. Each rated a school's reputation for academic quality in his or her discipline on a 5-point scale ranging from "marginal" to "distinguished." The criteria were scholarly production, the quality of the curriculum and the reputation of its faculty and students. The school with the highest average was ranked as No. 1.

U.S. News & World Report ranked Villanova No. 1 among regional undergraduate universities in the North in 1990. However, the University fell to No. 3 in the rankings in 1991.

Vandals deface AIDS poster exhibit at university

By College Press Service

Vandals used black spray paint to deface an acclaimed international exhibit of 250 AIDS awareness posters at the University of Southern Maine's Portland campus.

Ninety-nine of the posters on loan from the Centre for AIDS Documentation, Research and Education (CADRE) of Canada were damaged or destroyed. The exhibit, titled "Visual AIDS," is currently on a tour of college campuses across the United States.

Vandals armed with spray paint cans apparently entered the student center shortly after security guards opened the doors at 7 a.m. March 5.

"Some will not be able to be replaced, some of the most interesting posters," said Clarence Crossman, CADRE spokesman from his London, Ontario, office. "I feel very angry and frustrated. I feel these feelings as well as a determination to capitalize on this to raise [AIDS] consciousness.

"There have been efforts to censor it in various ways. This is the first time it has been defaced," Crossman said.

The damaged posters remained on view through the scheduled end of the exhibition at the university's Portland campus. A ribbon of black paint randomly scarred portions of the exhibit, marring posters both innocent and sexually explicit. Among them were posters of the parting of the Red Sea with the caption "Until there's a miracle, the only cure for AIDS is you," a nude silhouette of a pregnant woman warning of the dangers of passing AIDS to an unborn child, and naked men in an erotic embrace.

> Some will not be able to be replaced, some of the most interesting posters. I feel very angry and frustrated. I feel these feelings as well as a determination to capitalize on this to raise [AIDS] consciousness.

> Clarence Crossman, CADRE spokesman

One poster produced by Art Against AIDS, which depicts the history of the disease, now bears the word "Sodom."

"We originally were considering replacing [the damaged posters] with black paper," said Martha Cook, an intern in the university's art department. "But we want people to see what has happened."

The posters include examples of AIDS awareness efforts from countries such as the United States, Canada, and Japan, as well as every European country, Australia, and African and South American nations.

Others said they hoped the continuation of the exhibit would make a powerful statement about the often-hysterical reaction to AIDS.

"It will draw more attention to the issue. The big value of this show is the message. The show will be able to go on, and it may have some impact that it otherwise might not have had," said Craig Hutchinson, associate director of student life.

"This exhibit was put together by an arts organization, funded by a major Canadian insurance company [London Life], has been displayed at over 100 other locations and this [vandalism] has never happened," said Professor Chris Reed, who specializes in the study of AIDS graphics. "This is a major embarrassment to USM and to Maine."

Students deplored the vandalism, even when their personal feelings were less than positive.

"It's a little graphic. I'm not 100 percent sure it needs to be as graphic as it is. I am 100 percent sure it needs to be up," said sophomore Julie Hallet, a nursing major. "I think that if people need to express their opinions, there are more constructive ways than vandalism."

"Whoever did it made it stand out. It will make the message more substantial," added sophomore Andrew Hogan, a criminology major. "Now more people are coming by to see what happened."

Currently, there are no suspects in the vandalism, according to the director of campus police and safety. An investigation is continuing.

Abortion debate

Pennsylvania National Organization for Women (NOW).

NOW is advocating a March to Keep Abortion Safe and Legal in Washington, D.C., April 5. "The march will probably be the largest pro-choice rally in the world," Ruthsdotter said.

A pro-life march took place Jan. 22 in Washington, D.C., on the 19th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

The Philadelphia Christian Action Council (CAC) is a pro-life coalition of Southeast Pennsylvania, whose mission statement is to mobilize Christians to protect women and unborn children, said David Squires, a volunteer at the CAC.

They mobilize people through medical, legal and psychological education; compassion ministries, which offer alternatives to abortion; efforts to influence public policies, such as lobbying legislature; and grassroots activism, by participating in protests and marches, said Squires.

Over the past 10 years, CAC helped set up more than 400 crisis pregnancy centers for women to receive advice from a pro-life perspective, Squires said.

Abortion is a human issue, not just a religious one, according to information from Campus Pro-Life Literature located in West Chester, Pa.

"The question of abortion is a basic human question that concerns the entire civilized society in which we live . . . It is a question of who lives or dies," according to the Campus Pro-Life Literature.

Diversity

Another problem Campaign for Community faced was misunderstandings about what their organization's policies are.

"We faced opposition [from groups] that thought we were an affirmative action committee or a radical peace and justice organization," said Steering Committee member B. Teresa Sharpe.

Other groups thought that they supported abortion and other controversial issues that went against and threatened Catholic teachings.

Michaela Battista, another committee member, said "all 11 members of the committee possess different political feelings about those issues. Our goal is not to purport those issues but to make people aware of what is going on in the world and on campus."

"Our goal is to provide a forum for the exchange of ideas and to promote openness of others, so that our differences can foster respect and understanding of all peoples," according to the Campaign for Community mission statement.

Alvare said she is a cultural or celebrational feminist, rather than a radical one. "There are differences between men and women . . . and they [the differences] should be accommodated, not swept away," she said.

Universities have a large role in the abortion debate, because of the medical research that is done there, said Alvare.

Ultrasound has been reported to be the single greatest threat against abortion, because the fetus is seen as a life, Alvare said.

"When I see students [running pro-life groups], I am so encouraged," Alvare said. This movement will help create a society that welcomes children, women and women with families, she added.

Diversity needs less talk, more action

A year ago, student hopes ran high for the coming "Year of Diversity." Former Student Government President Kerry Stromberg issued a call to all students interested in creating a concrete plan of action to raise campus awareness regarding issues of diversity. What happened?

"Diversity Day" took place on Monday. The committee formed from Stromberg's "Year of Diversity" idea, the "Campaign for Community," organized a series of events addressing issues of diversity. It symbolized their year-long effort to get events off the ground.

Certainly, the idea was good. Villanova needs more days like Martin Luther King Jr. Day. But, active student participation was small and Diversity Day lacked the vigor of MLK Day.

The "Campaign for Community" suffers from poor publicity, and it must involve more student organizations in order to be successful. We really need to go beyond lectures and begin activity.

Stromberg envisioned different groups coming together to sponsor events. For example, a Greek fraternity/sorority might team with an organization such as the Student Coalition Against Apartheid and Racism to coordinate a group activity. Let us begin a "Campaign for Community" that forges friendships between different groups on campus. Let us begin to act.

Hoops program stumbling

The men's basketball national championship season of 1985 seems a distant memory seven years later. As the Cats struggled to a 14-13 regular season record and lost to Syracuse in the first round of the Big East Tournament this season, they proved true a growing trend. The NIT bid accepted by the team after being shunned by the NCAA Tournament selection committee is not embarrassing. Yet, the fact remains that the basketball program has slipped since the glory years of the mid-1980s.

For the third time in seven years, the Cats missed out on an NCAA bid, the standard for elite programs. From 1982-85, 'Nova made the Final Eight of the NCAAs three times. It has advanced to that round only once, in 1988, since the championship season. The prestige and national attention of the championship was expected to legitimize Villanova basketball as an annual basketball power. Instead, the program has suffered from inconsistency, recruiting disappointments and unfulfilled expectations since 1985.

For example, the 1991-92 season was thought to be the time for 'Nova to re-establish itself on the national scene. The Cats returned all five starters and three bench players from a team that reached the second round of the NCAAs. But results fell short of hopes. Not only did the Cats not improve despite abundant experience, but they regressed.

The Cats were brilliant at times and horrible at other times, but mediocre overall.

The Cats have not lost fewer than 13 games in a season since the championship. The reason is partly because of the difficulty of schedule and growing parity in the Big East. But the major reason is inconsistency and unfulfilled potential. The Cats' recruiting classes of 1992 and 1993, present Cat juniors and seniors, were considered 'Nova's best back-to-back groups in school history. But the track record proves disappointing. In the last four years, the Cats have made the NCAAs and NIT twice each. Average, but not as high as anticipated.

If 'Nova is to once again gain national glory, better recruiting and consistency is needed.

Article slights swimmers' win

To the Editor:

I am writing in regard to the article entitled "Women Capture Big East" (March 13 issue). Considering the magnitude of the feat that the Villanova Women's Swimming and Diving Team accomplished, this article was highly inadequate.

Never before, in the history of the Big East Conference, has a team defeated Pittsburgh at this championship meet. The effort put in by all 18 women, including the divers who were extremely instrumental and whom you failed to mention, marked a great event in the history of Big East Swimming. Your article definitely missed out on the size of this achievement.

The 'Nova women have geared themselves for this meet since they started training the second week of September. Since then, they have broken almost half of their team records, finished with a record of 11-1, moved into 21st place in the country and won their first ever Big East title. How many other Villanova teams can boast this?

If you could only begin to conceive of the hard work and spirit that drives this team, you might have been able to, at least, give them the top story or the Athlete of the Week position. After all, their record was a little better than .500 and they at least finished top five in the conference.

I hope in the future you will begin to look more closely at these women and how they have come from not even being ranked three years ago to becoming the team to beat in the East. A great team is in the making and it is worthy of and deserves more attention than it has been given. I hope you have heard me and that things will change in the future.

I would also like to take this time to thank all those who have supported and encouraged us throughout this season. Your efforts are much appreciated by all!

Freind challenged

To the Editor:

In response to Mark O'Rourke's plea to Villanova students to support State Representative Stephen Freind's bid for the U.S. Senate (March 13 issue), and as a resident of Mr. Freind's legislative district for over 19 years, I would like to offer the following.

Freind did not display any of the characteristics mentioned by O'Rourke when he flagrantly violated the state ethics code by using taxpayers' money for his private law and campaign office. Freind also displayed none of these characteristics when he stated on the floor of the state legislature, "I don't have to rape my wife, I pay her every time."

Truth and integrity certainly did not play into Freind's campaign for state representative two years ago. During that campaign he sent out literature claiming that unless he was elected, the 166th District would be redistricted into Philadelphia and would get (gasp!) a black congressman. The irony of it all is that when the critical redistricting vote was going on, Freind was not even there. He said his vote would not matter anyway. I also find it amusing that Freind is screaming for a debate when Freind, himself, refused to debate his opponent in the last general election.

I also wonder what vision O'Rourke is referring to. Is it Freind's "vision" that a woman who is raped can not get pregnant because she secretes a certain secretion that kills sperm? Maybe O'Rourke thinks this is okay since Freind received his "information" from Nazi death camp experiments and not as a Villanova undergraduate.

Abortion: Moral issue or Gender issue?

Pro-life speaks . . .

By KRISTEN HAAF

Abortion advocates will be marching in Washington, D.C., April 5 carrying the banner "We Won't Go Back." These advocates claim that they do not want to go back to the times when abortion was illegal in our nation. These advocates feel that Roe v. Wade must be kept intact and a law must be passed that will codify the decision.

As a result of Roe v. Wade, there are 4,400 abortions performed each day in our country and 1.6 million each year. Abortion is legal up to and including the ninth month of pregnancy and 160,000 abortions are performed in the second and third trimesters of pregnancy. Taxpayers are forced to pay for abortion on demand. Women have died and are dying from "safe," legal abortions in our nation. Fetuses that survive an abortion are either drowned or die from exposure. Is this what abortion advocates want to continue in our nation? Is this progress?

Support groups for women that have been victimized by abortion have formed all over our nation. Women Exploited By Abortion, Victims of Choice, American Victims of Abortion and Project Rachel help countless women cope with the trauma of an abortion. Mary Cunningham Agee, director and founder of The Nurturing Network, began an informal study of aborted women and found that over 90 percent of these women would have chosen life had they known about the financial, medical and emotional support available to women in a crisis pregnancy. A study undertaken by Victims of Choice found that 80 percent of the women interviewed felt coerced into an abortion by either a boyfriend, family member, spouse, social worker, minister, etc. Is this what abortion advocates want to continue in our nation? Is this progress?

When a woman walks out of an abortion clinic, she still faces sexual discrimination. She still earns 70 cents to every man's dollar. She still is sexually harassed in the workplace. This woman now has another problem in her life, the reality that her child has been destroyed.

The abortion advocates are marching not to improve social problems in society. Indeed, Planned Parenthood spends less than 1 percent of its annual budget on prenatal care or care for a woman that has chosen life. Instead, abortion advocates are marching for a woman's right to abort the fetus resting in her womb up through all nine months of pregnancy if the child has not been conceived at a convenient time. They are marching to continue sex selection abortions. They are marching to continue taxpayer funded abortions. They are marching to continue taxpayer funded abortions. They are marching to continue to prohibit parents of minors or spouses to be notified of an abortion.

We must move forward to an ethic where all human life, from conception until natural death, is deemed sacred, respected and cherished. We must move forward towards an attitude in which a crisis pregnancy is no longer a crisis.

We will not go back to abortion on demand through all nine months of pregnancy. We will not go back to taxpayer funding of abortions done for convenience. We must move forward to an ethic where all human life, from conception until natural death, is deemed sacred, respected and cherished. We must move forward to creating an environment in which progress and equality are not at the expense of another human being's welfare or life. We must move forward towards an attitude in which a crisis pregnancy is no longer a crisis.

The hallmark of every civilized society is how the society treats its weakest and most vulnerable members. Do we feed the hungry? Do we clothe the naked? Do we love the unloved? Or do we kill them? The "We Won't Go Back" march is advocating an idea that is bringing our civilized society back to its barbaric origins where children deemed "unwanted" died from drowning or being exposed. We must move forward and respect all the members of our society, especially the most vulnerable member of our society, the unborn child.

Pro-choice speaks . . .

By MONICA McDERMOTT and MICHELE ROSSI

With a possible overturn of Roe v. Wade looming on the horizon, and the National Organization for Women's "We Won't Go Back: The March For Women's Lives" calling for the largest demonstration ever by supporters of reproductive freedom, we think it is time to examine this label of reproductive freedom, to imagine how it could be, what it currently means, and where we never wish women to be again.

What we would like to see: Safe, fool-proof contraceptives for men and women, affordable and accessible to all to be used consistently by sexual partners whose education allows them to communicate respectfully about their wishes and needs. An end to violence against women. Unplanned pregnancy obsolete. Abortion unnecessary. Universal health care a right, not a privilege. Racism, sexism gone. No more second-class citizens. An economic system geared to the satisfaction of needs, and not hostile to the family — all kinds. We're working toward it — cue. This is where we wake up.

Supporting reproductive freedom is not synonymous with being pro-abortion. It is, however, a state of respecting the gravity of another's dilemma, and allowing that individual to make a decision taking into account her conscience and her situation.

The society we live in oppresses women (though not only women, and some women more than others) in insidious ways. Women expend valuable energy worrying about what will be done to their bodies without their consent, before they even begin to consider what they themselves desire, and before they anticipate the consequences of their decisions. They compete in a system where economic prosperity translates into power, the power to act and the power to defend. Meanwhile, women are conditioned to accept the precepts of this system as inherently just and to accept relegation to low-wage, highly alienating sectors of the labor force; an auxiliary supply to be tapped according to the needs of the market. In such a context, the ability to control one's fertility is favorable to one's survival, and to one's working for change. Stated more simply, if a woman does not have control over her reproductive system, over her ability to bear children, she cannot compete and achieve in the public sphere because of the ever-looming possibility of an unplanned pregnancy.

This does not mean that abortion is a substitute for responsible sexual behavior, including the use of contraception. Simultaneously, one should acknowledge that even the most effective contraceptives, though used consistently and correctly, fail, if one is optimistic enough to assume that they are readily accessible and affordable. And, not all unplanned pregnancies (those resulting from rape and incest) are the result of willfully chosen sexual behavior.

Adoption is one positive means of dealing with an unplanned pregnancy. Yet, it is not a choice for all women. Unfortunately in our society, children with health problems, older children and children of color are less likely to be adopted.

Supporting reproductive freedom is not synonymous with being pro-abortion. Indeed, its proponents oppose reproductive coercion of any sort. It is, however, a state of respecting the gravity of another's dilemma, and allowing that individual to make a decision taking into account her conscience and her situation. Women contemplating an abortion must take stock of their whole lives: their spiritual beliefs, their needs, the needs of their families, their health, income and ability to support a child. Women who choose abortion do so because they are not able to take on the enormous responsibility of raising a child.

When supporters of reproductive freedom say, "We don't go back," it may be helpful to recall that to which we refuse to return: fear, powerlessness, an absence of compassion, the belief that a woman's reproductive capability overrides all else in her life: her thoughts, her feelings, her physical and mental health and her readiness to bear and provide for a child. Of course, the back alley, throwing oneself down a flight of stairs, wire hangers and warm gin do not bear mentioning in polite company. Many women died or became sterile as a result of these methods. Then again, back-alley abortionists do not require spousal or parental consent, and wire hangers are indifferent to ideology, social class and the ability to pay.

Are we serious about diversity?

By LACHLAN WHALEN

When the Center for Peace and Justice advertised the showing of the film "Geronimo and the Apache Resistance," I was elated. Perhaps the talk about improving diversity at Villanova would prove to be more than wind in the grass; at last there was a presentation directly relevant to Native Americans.

As it turned out, however, I was alone in my enthusiasm, for (with the exception of one young woman who stayed about 15 minutes) I turned out to be the sole viewer. As I sat in solitude watching the story of a man dubbed an outlaw by white society simply for defending his homeland and way of life, I wondered why others had decided they did not need to see this story.

> What better way to study one's own society than through examining the way in which it treats other cultures?

Perhaps not many were aware of the presentation, after all, it was not aggressively publicized. Yet, with a circulation of 8,000, it is surprising that the Villanovan did not bring in at least one or two additional viewers. While I understand that there are few students of Native American blood attending this university, the invitation was open to all.

What better way to study one's own society than through examining the way in which it treats other cultures? It seems to me that even under the best of circumstances the world of the Wasicun (white man) generally, in the words of the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., "seeks to transform all cultures it encounters."

I pose the question, does that world allow itself to be transformed in return? Does this transformation go hand in hand with an understanding of and respect for the beliefs and lifeways of these other cultures? "Civilization" is often at its most brutal when it ethnocentrically attempts to convert other peoples to its way of thinking; often this conversion is attempted through suppression of sacred native custom.

Destruction of traditional Native American spirituality has long been the goal of white society, for to destroy this is to effectively destroy traditional culture as well. Stripped of cultural identity, the Indian could be easily assimilated into the alien culture of the Wasicun.

In this country, where freedom of religion is supposedly guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, the federal government attempted to outlaw Native American religious practices in 1890. Well-meaning missionaries also took part in this attempt at cultural genocide as Christians who learned native languages not in an attempt to carry on a mutual dialogue of religious thought, but to unconditionally convert.

Even today on reservations such as Pine Ridge, it is not uncommon to see (as the anthropologist William K. Powers perfectly describes) "a religious ritual in which a Catholic priest offers up a sacred pipe before mass, wearing vestments decorated in beads and quills." Does this white priest believe in the holiness, the power of this symbol of the Lakota nation? Undoubtedly not, and as such, it is a blasphemy for an object that is so holy (wakan) to be used in such a manner. It is a ruse of the missionary church which, in the words of the Jesuits, "uses the best of any culture for its own advantage" (Holy Rosary Mission 1963,20).

In contrast to these deceitful and oppressive measures (which seem to be concerned more with conformity to Wasicun culture than spiritual enlightenment), Lakota religious tradition emphasises acceptance and understanding of others. Nevertheless, it is important to have knowledge of one's own background, especially when it is being actively assaulted. In The Sacred Pipe, the great Lakota medicine man, Black Elk, gives an account of the seven most sacred rites of the Oglala, at the heart of which is the symbol of the Lakota nation: the sacred pipe.

Black Elk says, "I have wished to make this book through no other desire than to help my people in understanding the greatness and truth of our own tradition, and also to help in bringing peace upon the earth, not only among men, but within men and between the whole of creation."

The modern day Lakota medicine man, Lame Deer, has said, "Wakan Tanka (the Great Mystery of the Lakota), Jesus, Allah, it does not matter. They are all one." This is not a misunderstanding of the doctrinal differences between these three religions, but rather, it is said out of a deep understanding of human kinship.

At heart, we are all relations — it is externals with which we distance ourselves from one another, externals which often are the reasons behind oppression and hatred. Now is the time to move beyond outward appearances, and this may only be done through mutual dialogue. Learning about other lifeways is never harmful; forced conversion to them always is.

Lachlan Whalen is a graduate assistant in the English department. He would like to thank his Grandfathers, the medicine men of the Pine Ridge and Rosebud Reservations for their wisdom and spiritual guidance.

When will Democrats begin work for real reforms?

By MAT A. TOENNIESSEN

In response to Gary Sudborough's commentary on Republican ideals (March 13 issue), I feel as though he is yet another person fooled by the Democrats who repeat lies so often that they become accepted as truth.

First, in response to the attack on President Bush going back on his "No new taxes" pledge, this was not "an outright lie," as Sudborough would have us believe. In the 1990 budget agreement Bush agreed to new taxes because it was part of a compromise with the Democrats. Supposedly, the Democrats were required to keep future spending below a limit, which they have not, and future budgets were to be written without deficit spending for obscure programs, like the $100,000 taxpayers spent last year for two farmers to watch wheat grow.

> [The Democrats] seem to hate anything that works, costs less and means less government interference in our lives.

The Democrats' part of this budget "compromise" has been ignored by Congress, who took the new tax money from Bush's increase and spent it without a thought. President Bush has since admitted he made a mistake agreeing to a compromise with the Democrats because he raised taxes and the Democrats reneged on their part of the deal. This now gives Bush the perfect excuse to exercise his Constitutional right of the line-item veto to cross out the Democrats' idiotic spending programs without vetoing the whole bill.

Secondly, when did big business, and more importantly, small business, become evil? Without the capital spending of big business this country would collapse economically. The capital gains tax cut that President Bush wants would speed up capital spending and also allow homeowners to benefit from the increase of their home's value by not being hit with huge taxes when they sell. Japan has only a 2 percent capital gains tax, and Germany has 0 percent. Maybe that has something to do with why these countries are killing us economically; they support big business investment.

Thirdly, as for housing and the poor, the Democrats have repeatedly shot down all spending allocations for Housing and Urban Development Secretary Jack Kemp's housing programs since Mr. Kemp wants to take control of housing projects away from the profit-making bureaucracy that exists today and give it to the tenants themselves. Kemp knows that by giving the people who live in the buildings the ability to own their home with low interest loans we ensure that they will take care of those homes and have pride in them, much as someone takes better care of a car they own than one they rent. The Democrats fear that this empowerment will work and, God forbid, a Republican administration would succeed where 25 years of liberal housing policies have failed.

The Democrats fear anything that takes government out of our lives, and this goes for education reform also. At the 1988 Democratic Convention two-thirds of the delegates were either members themselves, or related to a member of the National Education Association (NEA), the biggest obstacle to school choice.

President Bush wants parents to be able to choose what school they send their children to. This means competition would decide which public schools stay open and which ones close. The NEA hates this idea because most private schools can teach a kid better — for thousands of dollars less — than public school can, which means they would face more accountability and pressure to actually teach our children something. They hate school choice because it points out how ineffective their bureaucracy is.

When will Democrats stop claiming they care and start helping Bush put through his programs that will really help the economy, the poor and education? Probably never, since they seem to hate anything that works, costs less and means less government interference in our lives. No amount of distortions or lies about Republicans will help them.

Cigarette advertisers grab the lungs of the young

By ELLEN GOODMAN

In a year when political ad-watching has become a media special, I am not surprised at the fate of Joe Camel. He is getting the truth-in-advertising treatment. At this rate, the old smoothie may not even make it through the primaries.

Old Joe was just another cartoon character when he immigrated here from European ads. He ended up in the hands of consultants and message marketers who decided he was the candidate to grab the hearts, minds and lungs of Americans.

Soon, his name recognition became the envy of the entire field of competitors. Among certain segments of the population today, Old Joe Camel is as well known as Mickey Mouse. Why, 91.3 percent of 6-year-olds not only know Old Joe, but what he stands for. That is more than can be said for Old George Bush.

Joe's image is fixed in the public mind as a Smooth Character. He is known far and wide for shooting pool, scuba diving and, of course, smoking.

He also has an acknowledged sex appeal. There is first and foremost his, uh, nose, prominently displayed or dare I say hung, on thousands of billboards. Then there are the girls who surround him at the Oasis, and the T-shirts, and the promotion of Hump Day.

But now, despite all the efforts of campaign consultants and media experts, the Camel Cigarettes candidate may finally have met his match. Last week, Surgeon General Antonia Novello, along with the American Medical Association, called on RJR Nabisco to dump the dromedary. And they asked magazines and retailers to ban the cartoon cigarette pusher from their premises.

The opposition has finally proved that Old Joe's campaign message is directed at citizens too young to smoke. A growing body of research shows that this commercial creature has been deliberately directed by his handlers to get children sold on smoking. He is working the underage nicotine beat.

> If cigarettes were invented today, they would never get on the market.

An assortment of studies in last December's Journal of the American Medical Association showed that Old Joe was extremely effective in delivering his $75 million-a-year message. Young children found the cartoon more appealing than adults did, and they acted on it. Camel's share of the illegal children's cigarette market jumped from 0.5 percent to 32.8 percent in three years.

The cigarette makers, who make your average politician look like a paragon of straight-talking virtue, insist there is no proof that advertising leads to smoking among children. They advertise merely to increase their share of the adult market.

But you do the math. In any given year only some 10 percent of smokers switch brands, while two million quit — 400,000 of them quit the hard way, by dying from tobacco-related illness. About 90 percent of the people who smoke started before they were 20 years old. The only source of new customers is kids.

The Camel Campaign is so blatant, so pernicious a pitch to hook the young that even Advertising Age editorialized against the ads. But it has to be that blatant and the pernicious before a public made passive by smoking reacts.

The last time enough fire was raised to throw the cigarette rascals out was in 1990 when RJR test-marketed a cigarette targeted directly at African-American lungs. "Uptown" went down.

In fairness, Marlboro Man is not far behind the front-runner Old Joe in his pitch for the kiddie vote. The assorted ads associating slimness and smoking may do as much damage to teen-age girls as the Smooth Character.

Cigarettes simply remain the renegade of the American system. Lethal but legal, lawful but unregulated.

If cigarettes were invented today, they would never get on the market. But because they are on the market, we can not get them off without creating a huge underground of lawbreaking addicts. Tobacco is exempt from every federal health and safety act. The Surgeon General can only ask RJR to give Joe the heave and use moral persuasion against the magazine ad directors.

The only way to reduce the enormous health risks of smoking is to encourage quitting and discourage starting. But every year some 1.8 million Americans start smoking. Which brings us back to the tobacco industry's $3.6 billion-a-year ad budget — enough money to send any cartoon figure to the White House.

My own view is that cigarette advertising is intrinsically false except for the little rectangles carrying the Surgeon General's warnings. But the worst of the pitchmen are those who stick their noses under the children's tent. So we begin with candidate Camel.

If the issue of the year is character, Old Joe is the first to go.

Remember Dorothy Day

To the Editor:

It is part of the human condition to admire and draw inspiration from others among us who live their life in an extraordinary way. In almost every human endeavor, be it athletics, art, drama, literature, scholarship or business, people draw inspiration from individuals of the past or present who have achieved a degree of excellence in their pursuit in this life.

Christians throughout the ages have also drawn inspiration from those in their midst who seem to live such exceptional lives of faith. Most of the pictures of our Christian saints show them as pious, pale and almost as not really involved in the world of human persons.

One modern exception to this is the person and portrait of Dorothy Day that is coming to Villanova on Tuesday, March 24. "Haunted By God" is a new professional dramatic portrait of one of the most outspoken and influential 20th century American Catholics.

Dorothy Day died in 1980, having spent most of her 83 years living with the poor and writing, speaking, fund raising, picketing and getting arrested on their behalf. Hundreds of Catholic Worker mission houses and a national newspaper (still a penny a copy) carry on. Now, to her legacy, "Haunted By God" is produced; a one-hour, one-woman play produced by Call To Action, a national Catholic reform organization from Chicago.

"Haunted By God" is a new dramatic portrait filled with humor, pain and joy. This compelling one-woman show explores the struggles and faith of Dorothy Day, co-founder of the Catholic Worker. It is drawn from her spiritual journey, her writings and a life dedicated to works of mercy.

Dorothy Day's pacifism and radical economics were shaped by her religious idealism and Christian faith. Three generations of Christians have found in Dorothy Day a model for putting faith into action. Some have even proposed her for sainthood. Her complicated personal life — two intense unmarried relationships resulted in a child and an abortion — would not seem to further that cause within the prim confines of some traditional views of sainthood.

Nor would Dorothy Day's own words. "I am not a saint," she objected, when a master of ceremonies introduced her as that. "I will not be dismissed so easily."

"Haunted By God" will be held Tuesday at 8 p.m. in Corr Chapel. All are welcome. This is sponsored by the Campus Ministry and Peace and Justice Education Departments.

'Novans dance for fundraiser

By NOREEN GIBLIN
Staff Reporter

Have you ever wondered what it would be like to literally "Twist the Night Away"? Approximately 50 energetic Villanovans found out the answer to this inquiry as they took part in the second annual 24-hour "Tic Toc Dance Around the Clock" Marathon March 13-14 in the Jake Nevin Fieldhouse.

The Dance Marathon tradition originated in February 1973 with 39 couples on the Penn State University campus. The success of the event sparked phenomenal growth. Last month Penn State held its 19th annual marathon where students danced for 48 hours and earned over $1 million for their charity.

While Villanova's program has not yet developed to this extent, its goals and aims are just as ambitious. Last year, the Marathon raised over $3,000. Chaired by the enthusiastic duo of Director Dean Libutti and Assistant Director Ann Magee, the 1992 marathon garnered close to $3,750. Katie Flemming raised $403 — the most money among participants. Proceeds from the event will be benefit Pennsylvania Special Olympics.

Proceeds from the event will benefit Pennsyivania Special Olympics.

The dancers' reactions were positive. Sophomore Jennifer Gallagher "enjoyed formulating new friendships and working hard for a good cause." The fact that "people at school can still have fun without alcohol" was a positive aspect for another first-year participant.

The dancers survived the all-nighter thanks to a frequent change of D.J.s and bands. Last Call, Perfect Timing, the Motions, Ken Schaffer Sound and Video and the Pros were some of the acts that performed. The Motions even let some of the dancers come on stage and sing along with them. Many local businesses donated prizes, decorations, gift certificates and food for the dancers.

For Libutti, the highlight of the program came at 6 p.m. Saturday when some Special Olympians came to dance. "I was totally exhausted and seeing them really gave me the extra boost to make it through the last hour. It made all the work seem worthwhile," he said.

The Dance Marathon resulted in some soreness and stiffness for participants but also helped them learn a lot about themselves and gain some new friendships. With the motivated students partaking in and running the event, the program is sure to continue to develop and grow tremendously.

Fair highlights career options

By GREGG MC QUEEN
Staff Reporter

Are you a frustrated senior who remains jobless as your college days creep closer to an end? Are you an underclassman looking for internship possibilities? Or, are you still uncertain of what career to choose? An event will take place on campus next week that just might be beneficial to your future.

Wednesday, March 25, from 3:30 p.m. to 7 p.m. in the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center, the Villanova Advertising Club will sponsor a Communication Arts Career Day. The event targets students who are interested in advertising, marketing, broadcasting, public relations, publishing, graphic arts and theater. Active professionals from all of these fields will attend to discuss their occupations with students, presenting an outstanding opportunity for students to gather detailed information about these careers and make contacts.

Many top firms from the area will assemble, satisfying a broad range of career interests. Some of the most highly-rated advertising agencies in the nation should be represented at the career fair. Several area broadcasting outlets, such as WCAU-TV, Greater Media Cable, WYSP Radio and Eazy-101 Radio are also slated to attend.

Publishing giant, the Chilton Company, and Delaware County Daily Times will represent the print media. The public relations firm of Earle Palmer Brown will be present. Spiro, Philadelphia Direct Marketing Association, White Marketing Group, Philadelphia Festival Theatre for New Plays, The McCabe Group (advertising), McKinney Public Relations, Walker and Naylor (graphic arts) and SKF Bearings, Inc., are also scheduled to appear. (Some of these organizations may be subject to change.)

Several alumni will take part in the event. John Burkavage of Eazy-101 Radio, Len LeBarth of Delaware County Daily Times, Paul McCabe of The McCabe Group and Karen Cutler of McKinney Public Relations are all planning to attend.

The fair will begin at 3:30 p.m. with a keynote speech on "How to Find a Communications Industry Job in the 90s." The guest speaker will be Chas Magee of the Manchester Agencies, an executive placement firm located in King of Prussia. Magee will present strategies designed to aid job hunters in these difficult economic times, including tips on networking. From 4 p.m. to 7 p.m., students will be free to speak with the various professionals individually.

The Villanova Business/Professional Advertising Association (B/PAA) sponsoring the event is an international organization for business-to-business practitioners. Villanova has one of only 13 student chapters nation-wide. It is ideal for undergraduates interested in advertising, marketing and public relations as careers.

In addition to holding monthly meetings on campus, the club is active in special projects, such as organizing career days and doing the advertising campaign for the "Careers for a Brighter Future" program at Villanova.

Membership in the student chapter means contacts with professionals, relationships which are beneficial when seeking internships or entry-level jobs. Many of the professionals attending the career fair are B/PAA members. Students who are interested should stop by the B/PAA table that will be set up in the Villanova Room lobby during the career fair. Taking advantage of on-campus functions like the career fair can give you an edge in the job market.

Do 'Novans still care about diversity?

By SUSAN BURNS
Staff Reporter

In the beginning of the year, "multiculturalism" was on the minds and lips of practically every student. Debates and discussions occupied our time, and articles and editorials argued the issue in the newspaper. It was everywhere. What has happened since then, and where is the diversity drive heading?

The multiculturalism issue is far from fading out, according to senior history major and Campaign for Community member, Chris Andraca.

The roots of the diversity dilemma are actually within each student.

"When the program began, we [the steering committee] thought that all we had to do was take a good look at the campus to shed a different light on the groups and issues here. This first year for Campaign for Community has been a success."

The organization has sponsored several events to increase awareness of the targeted issues — date rape seminars, World AIDS Week and Work Force 2000.

The group's most recent effort, Diversity Awareness Day, was held in the Connelly Center March 16, and featured about 20 Villanova faculty members who spoke on everything from "Mass media and the homogenization of cultures," to "The United States from the point of view of a Central American peasant."

"It was the culmination of a whole year's work," Andraca said, adding that he thought it was very successful. "We worried that there would not be much interest, but an average of 10 people attended each lecture."

Junior marketing major Esteban Nunez said, "The important part of this push for multiculturalism is that those involved are persistent and just keep on going until one day it is part of Villanova, the United States and the world." He added, "Also, if more people get involved, maybe people like me, who did not attend Diversity Day, will go, next time something is held."

"I think there's a big gap between the ideal and the real. I would like to see the issue as an important factor of university life," said senior English major Seton Alves of multiculturalism, which she defines as "the movement recognizing the presence of various cultures within our own community." She believes that our world now, with new communications has become a global community.

Alves predicts that the movement will either catch on and people will make changes, or "multiculturalism" will simply become a "buzz word," or catchy term, for the '90s.

Junior math major Jenny Holefelder worries that, because the publicity of the issue has died

Profiles provide views of presidential candidates

By SCOTT M. SCHEIDT
Staff Reporter

You might not have noticed the takeover at first. It encroached upon all matter of media with subtle influence and subversive force. It may have started with a few political commercials, then progressed to an occasional feature article in a news magazine. Currently, the 1992 presidential campaign is raging full-force, leaving many feeling confused and a little ignorant.

If the chaotic storm of campaign promises and candidates seems to have passed you by, fear not. You are still capable of rendering a responsible decision by election time. These political profiles are provided to lend a clue to political apathists who may just need an informed push toward the voting booths.

George Bush

Economic Growth: Bush has created a grab-bag plan for economic growth. It includes reducing the capital gains tax to 15.4 percent, imposing a 90-day moratorium on new federal regulations and adjusting federal income tax withholding to add an average of $3 to $7 to weekly paychecks. The plan would increase the exemption for each child by $500 and add a $5,000 tax credit and penalty-free IRA withdrawals for first-time home buyers.

BUSH

Social Policy: Bush has held a staunch pro-life stance since 1980. He tolerates sex education but stresses sexual abstinence as a preventative measure for pregnancy and sexually transmitted diseases. Bush advocates a strict law-and-order approach to crime and favors the death penalty. He supports welfare reform that would require able-bodied people to work.

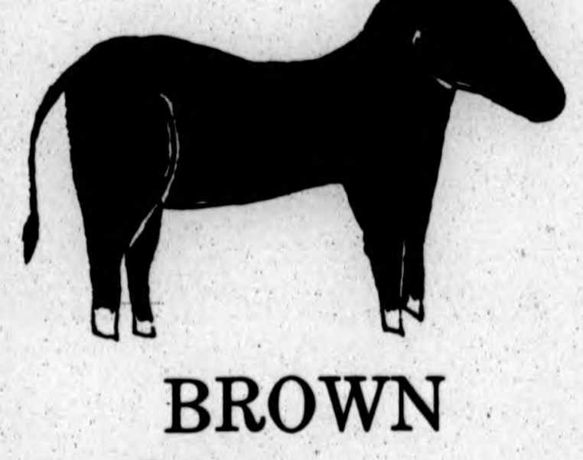
Energy/Environment: During his term, Bush passed the Clean Air Act, but did not achieve his goal of energy independence. He accepts a new restrictive definition of "wetlands." Bush supports offshore drilling. He wants to simplify nuclear plant licensing.

Bush advocates a strict law and order approach to crime and favors the death penalty.

Education: Bush, the self-styled "education president," favors national testing and a voucher system that would fund parental choice of either public or private schools. He supports an increase of funds for the Head Start program.

Health Care: Bush opposes "socialized medicine."

National Security: Bush promises to cut defense spending by $50 billion over the next five years, excluding the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) program. He has made modest progress in dismantling nuclear arms.



BROWN

Jerry Brown

Economic Growth: Brown believes that money in politics is the root of all evil. He feels it encourages a weak economy. He argues for term limitations and severe restrictions on fund raising to break the "strangle hold" that special interests have on Congress and the tax code. He intends to dump the existing tax structure and replace it with an across-the-board, flat-rate 13 percent tax on individuals, regardless of their means. Brown plans no deductions except for mortgages, rent and charitable giving.

Social Policy: Brown offers no welfare-reform solutions, but would give tax credits to businesses hiring workers from poor neighborhoods. Brown is pro-choice and supports writing abortion rights into law. He favors mandatory sentences for crimes committed with a gun and for repeat offenders. He opposes the death penalty as barbaric.

Energy/Environment: Brown accomplished much in the areas of conservation and renewable resources as California governor. He backs the new Civilian Conservation Corps. high speed rail travel and better automobile fuel efficiency. He holds a strong record in anti-nuclear issues.

Education: Brown plans to abolish the Department of Education as a "massive bureaucratic waste." He envisions a computer

'Novans volunteer in Mexico

By JOHN MULLIGAN
Associate Editor

Volunteers embark on service trips expecting to do good deeds. Their hearts want to give and their hands seek to work. Five members of the Villanova community traveled to Merida, Mexico for Spring Break bearing gifts and prepared to serve.

What they found blew their hearts out.

"We left two concrete floors and a roof we helped build," said Melissa Kenney, a junior political science major. "But what comes to mind is how much we were given. I feel so fortunate to have experienced the Yucatecan culture."

Kenney traveled to Mexico with sophomore students Tara Coughlin and Rajesh Dhirmalani, second year law student Wendy Sengstack and the Rev. Ed Hastings, O.S.A., on a trip sponsored by the Villanova Volunteers.

"We went to Mexico expecting to be overwhelmed by the poverty," said Kenney. "As far as material things are concerned, the people have nothing. But as far as ... love, happiness and faith ... they have everything."

The Villanova group stayed at the Mission of Friendship in Merida, the capital of the Mexican Yucatecan peninsula. In visits to small pueblos, a day care center and homes for the elderly handicapped, they experienced the Yucatecan culture and way of life.

> "Even the poorest families brought us into their homes and shared Cokes and fruit with us."
> Melissa Kenney

"The people are the hardest working people I have ever encountered. They are so proud of what they do," said Kenney.

"[Although] we went into homes with no running water, dirt floors and cardboard roofs, that is not what struck me most. The first thing that comes to mind is how beautiful the people were. Even the poorest families brought us into their homes and shared Cokes and fruit with us," she added.

The group came together near the end of last semester. The members met several times to coordinate fundraisers and discuss Mexican culture. Money and gifts came from family, friends and members of the Villanova community.

Kenney said the group was given much more than it accomplished. "I do not have all the words to describe our experience," she said. "But I know this experience has changed our lives."

According to the volunteers, their week in Mexico taught them things about life, physical poverty and personal happiness that could never be taught in a classroom. "They taught me what it really means to be rich," said Coughlin.

Top 10

Straight from the mouths of some babes who don't know much about basketball come the Top 10 reasons why Villanova's basketball team should still be invited to this year's NCAA tournament.

10. They beat Miami. Doesn't that count for anything?
9. Our mascot is way cooler than Syracuse's. What exactly is an Orangeman, anyway?
8. Our parents are paying a lot of money to send us here. We could have gone to Syracuse for much less.
7. We deserve it ... NOT!
6. Greg Woodard looks really good on television.
5. A trip to the tournament would provide 'Novans with yet another reason to miss classes.
4. We're still riding high on the reputation of our NCAA win in '85 ... Seven years isn't that long ago.
3. The game was a Saturday Night Live spoof. There's no way they could actually miss the basket that many times.
2. Rollie needs more exercise.

And the No. 1 reason why 'Nova should still be invited to the NCAA Tournament is:

1. Sorry, guys. We can't think of a legitimate reason for the team to be invited. Better luck next year.

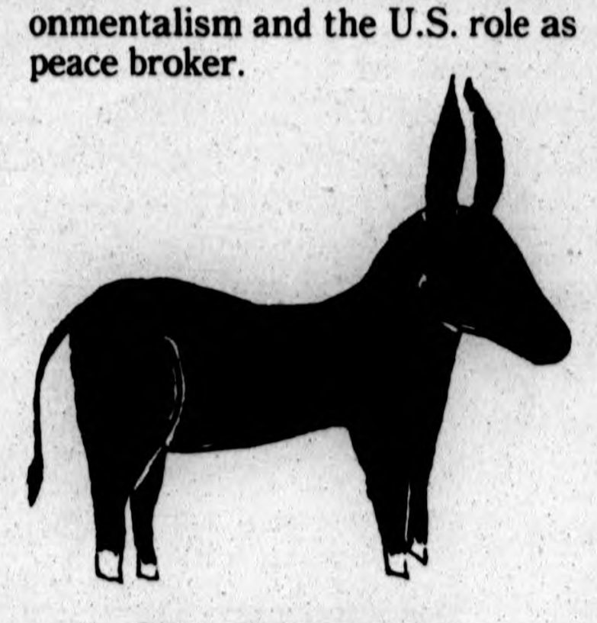
on top of every schoolchild's desk and federally funded educational software. he favors national educational standards and federal scholarships.

Health Care: Brown advocates a national health insurance system which would eliminate private insurers. He emphasizes wellness programs and alternative healing practices such as acupuncture.

> Brown believes that money in politics is the root of all evil.

National Security: Brown wants to cut defense spending by 50 percent immediately. He would withdraw all U.S. troops from Europe. Brown supports research for SDI, but plans to drop other high tech programs. Brown's emphasis remains on global environmentalism and the U.S. role as peace broker.



CLINTON

Bill Clinton

Economic Growth: Clinton emphasizes "fairness" to the middle class as well as economic growth. His short-term plans would cut middle class taxes by $350 a year and make it up with taxes on people making $200,000 a year or more. Clinton also hopes to increase tax credits for kids, accelerate highway-bill spending, create thousands of new jobs and aid first-time home buyers. His long-term intentions include developing a true economic strategy which he feels the United States currently lacks. Long-term, Clinton would like to extend free trade, greatly expand worker training and enact investment tax-credit.

Social Policy: Clinton is pro-choice, but supports some form of adult notification in the case of abortions sought by females under the age of 14. Under his "personal responsibility" plan, welfare recipients would receive two years of training, then be forced back to work. Clinton would use tax credit to aid working poor. He is a death penalty supporter. He stresses drug treatment for addicts and supports "boot camps" for juvenile offenders. Clinton evinces long-time support for civil rights and minority hiring.

Phone-a-thons add personal touch to admissions

Many students now look back and laugh at the harried and uncertain times they went through while deciding on the "perfect college." Although now that confusion seems to have occurred a lifetime ago, most college students can still relate to the worries and expectations of high school seniors.

In recent years, the phone-a-thon program offered through the Villanova Admissions office has helped to ease pre-freshman qualms about college life in general and, more specifically, to explain what college life is like at Villanova.

Some current Villanova students may have received a phone call during their application process. "The purpose of the call is not to sell the school, but to reassure the student about whatever decision he or she may make," said sophomore communications major Robyn Schnieders. Schnieders, an Admissions assistant, is the first student to coordinate the program.

Any concerns the prospective Villanova student might have may be addressed during the phone call. Schnieders said topics range from basketball to Philadelphia, although questions about classes and majors are most common. The conversations are intended to be relaxed and informal. Prospective students and callers are matched according to their major and similar geographic area.

Over 5,000 calls will be made this semester by student and faculty volunteers. Three separate phone-a-thons are held throughout the year. The first, which takes place in the fall before the application process even begins, targets students who indicate a preference for Villanova on their college board tests. The office attempts to reach students before the application deadline and address students' concerns about college in general, while emphasizing the ports 45 mpg cars, but opposes gas tax. He intends to help save rain forests by allowing locals to share in pharmaceutical company profits if they refuse to cut down trees.

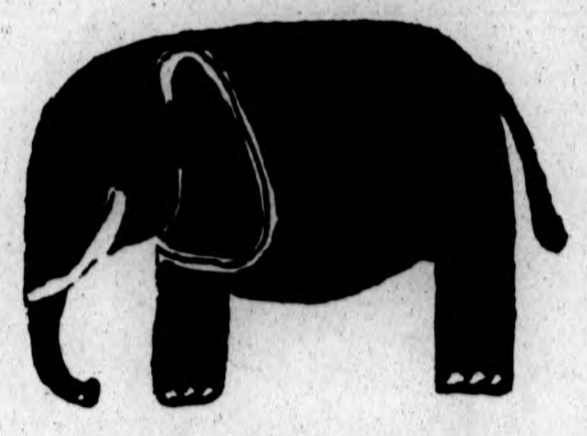
Education: Clinton backs a national exam system, annual report cards for every school and apprenticeship programs for students not bound for college. He supports college loans available to anyone — to be paid back either as percentage of future income or with service in teaching, police or child care.

Health Care: Clinton supports "play or pay" universal health coverage under which employers would have to insure their employees or pay an additional tax into a public fund to cover the uninsured.

National Security: Clinton plans to cut defense spending by 36 percent by 1997, saying $100 billion over the Bush plan.

Patrick Buchanan

Economic Growth: Buchanan's "America First" plan is comprised of tax cuts, slashed government and a possible trade war. The plan would completely abolish the capital gains tax for the middle class and cut by half the rates for those with income more than $50,000. Buchanan backs investment tax credits. He plans to freeze federal spending, hiring and salaries. Buchanan promises to play "hardball" with Japan and other countries, but is vague on the consequences of such a game.



BUCHANAN

Social Policy: Buchanan remains opposed to abortion under all circumstances. He supports the death penalty, advocating much speedier executions. He opposes any form of gun control. On the issue of immigration, Buchanan calls for digging a trench along the border between Mexico and the United States. He plans to eliminate affirmative action and end subsidies for "blasphemous" art. Buchanan holds a negative view of homosexuals, considering AIDS to be retribution for their actions.

Energy/Environment: Conservationists do not enjoy Buchanan's support. He advocates coastal oil drilling, but his positions on nuclear power, gas tax, global warming and pollution remain unclear.

Education: Buchanan supports the voucher system to promote choice and create market pressures to improve quality, but provides no specifics on implementation. Busing remains an issue for him.

Health Care: Buchanan has not made commitments to any reform, but will consider a plan in which employers open medical IRAs. He backs vouchers for about 75 percent of home-care-nursing expenses.

National Security: Buchanan favors a cut in the number of troops in Western Europe, but not in SDI or nuclear arms. He plans to phase out foreign-aid payments to the Third World. He favors ending trade concessions to the Chinese. he is anti-Israel and opposes majority rule in South Africa.

Paul Tsongas

Economic Growth: Tsongas plans to declare a national economic "emergency" on his first day in office. He opposes Clinton's middle-class tax cut. He favors investment and RSD tax credits to aid manufacturing. He would raise the top bracket of income tax to 33 percent and expand the availability of IRAs to promote savings. Tsongas is an anti-protectionist, but calls for a strong push to buy American. He wants a "flexible budget freeze" to reduce the deficit, but his plans are not specific.

TSONGAS

Social Policy: Tsongas is staunch in his pro-choice position, saying it should be a litmus test for Supreme Court nominees. He backs federally funded family-planning clinics and abortions for women in low-income situations. Tsongas was an early sponsor of a gay-rights bill and is willing to raise it publicly. Tsongas has no stated welfare policy. He supports a waiting period for gun purchases and advocates the death penalty for cop killers and major drug dealers.

Energy/Environment: Tsongas advises a minimal gas tax increase to achieve energy independence. He supports the use of some nuclear power. He was an early supporter of solar energy, wilderness preservation, recycling and tax credits for conservation.

Education: Tsongas endorses merit pay for teachers, competency requirements, national standards and an experimental voucher system that would include private school tuition. His policy on college loans entails repayment as a percentage of future income.

Health Care: Tsongas believes Americans will not support a radical plan. Under his "managed care" system, employers or groups would offer specific plans. Private insurers would bid for contracts and thereby introduce competition. This would be paid for by a six to eight percent payroll tax.

National Security: Tsongas plans to cut defense 30 percent, scrapping SDI and the B-2 bomber. He backs major troop reductions in Europe and the new "Marshall Plan" to aid the former Soviet Union.

As of March 19, Tsongas opted to drop out of the presidential race.

merits of Villanova.

The second phone-a-thon focuses on students who applied for early admission. This year, 600 calls were made in three nights by honors students who are members of the Blue Key Society. The third and largest calling period will take place in April and will target the 4,000 students who have been accepted in regular admission.

All students are encouraged to take part in the program either by calling prospective students or helping out in the office during the hectic days during which the phone-a-thon takes place. Students may make as many phone calls as they like and are trained before calling.

Those interested should seek information from the Admissions office during the day. The days on which this year's final phone-a-thon will take place are April 6-9, 13-15 and 21-23 from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m.

Schnieders expressed the many positive aspects of the program, such as knowing that one has influenced another's decision and helped ease another's anxieties about this major step in choosing a university. She said that sometimes a student needs advice from someone more impartial than family and friends to help put things in perspective.

"The main thing we are trying to do is get in touch with the high school student, but this also allows the Villanova student to give something back and to show their enthusiasm for their school. I would love for anyone to come in and help," said Schnieders.

down substantially, no more progress will be made. "This leads me to believe that this is only a one-year effort," she said, adding that she hopes Villanova will continue to strive for diversity.

"Villanova still has a long way to go — we're not diverse at all," said freshman engineering student Ron Jakominich, agreeing with Holefelder. "We have to bring more, different cultures into the melting pot."

Andraca disagrees and said that diversity does in fact exist here. "All we have to do is look inside, and it is right there," he said. "If we ask people questions, and find out about them, or take some time to think and have serious discussions, we will see."

The roots of the diversity dilemma are actually within each student. By starting small, maybe we can grow up to a universal awareness, and most efficiently tackle this mutlicultural ignorance.

Joe Pesci shines bright in 'Vinny'

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

Joe Pesci has become the hottest pint-sized comic actor in ages. Traditionally, he is not a comedian turned actor (i.e. Eddie Murphy, Robin Williams) but rather the '90s version of Danny Devito with a hint of DeNiro. His natural Italian persona and mafioso-like charm is endearing as well as amusing. "My Cousin Vinny" is no comical masterpiece, but rather an easy-to-take, flimsy plot with a lot of style.

Bill Gambini (Ralph Macchio) and his NYU college buddy Stan Rothenstein (Mitchell Whitfield) are driving to California on their semester break only to find themselves in Wazoo City, being tried for murder in a case of mistaken identity.

Enter Mr. Vincent La Guardia Gambini (Pesci), lawyer, after passing the bar on his sixth try and cousin of Bill, who is in desperate need of legal assistance. Hanging on to Vinny's gold chains is his tough-lipped auto-maniac studette Mona Lisa Vito (Marisa Tomei) who is concerned about the status of the city's Chinese take-out and taking snapshots with her little pink Le Clic.

MY COUSIN VINNY
A COMEDY OF TRIAL AND ERROR

The sparks begin to fly during Vinny's irregular courtroom antics. He dismisses witnesses by shouting, "I'm finished with dis guy" and making rebuttals such as "Every ting dis guy juss said is bull s——!" However, this is little Vincente's first case, and he is being pressed by a stubborn judge (Fred Gwynne), who is constantly throwing him in Jail for contempt of court, due to his rude mannerisms and a fleet of early morning disturbances that keep him awake no matter where he sleeps.

"If I could stay awake and keep my butt out of jail long enough, I could win dis case," says Vinny with new-found confidence.

Pesci is so charismatic that the movie's flaws are acceptable to the point of dismissal. Perhaps the most entertaining factor here is his exchanges with Tomei and Gwynne, not to mention his cross examination techniques. But because the movie does not aim high, it scores big on the character development. Vinny struts his way into your heart and leaves you with the sweet taste of cappuccino in your mouth.

> Pesci is so charismatic that the movie's flaws are surpassable to the point of dismission.

Byrne relies on ethnic rhythms for 'Uh-Oh'

By MAURA RURAK
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Uh-Oh, the long-awaited effort by the "former troublemaker of the Talking Heads" reached record stores March 17. David Byrne, in his traditional ethnic style, relies on much of the same rhythms that were found on Rei Mono for the foundation of Uh-Oh. As a result, this album shows Byrne's unique ability to mix calypso, reggae, pop and saucy Latin sounds into a modern masterpiece.

Although he never abandons the upbeat movement of the music, the mood and melody of the tracks are varied mainly by Byrne's own distinct voice. "A Walk In The Dark" is haunting and twisted, whereas "The Cowboy Mambo" holds classic dance qualities.

As with all Byrne efforts, the majority of the songs were written by him and contain his insightful views of the state of the world and its often gloomy future. "Monkey man let's get back to where we started/slide on down evolution is going backwards." (Monkey Man) One reason why the lyrics are so successful is that they are submerged in fun, positive music, proving how shallow and artificial much of the pop scene can be today.

> The mood and melody of the tracks are varied mainly by Byrne's own distinct voice.

On the cover of the Uh-Oh long cardboard CD box is a statement issued by Byrne. "This is garbage. (This box, that is.) The American record business insists on it, though. If you agree that it's wasteful, let your store management know how you feel." Always socially conscious, Byrne also included on the back a postcard that listeners can send to their senator demanding such things as equal rights, universal health care, economic equality, education and freedom of expression.

Byrne's musical genius is obvious on every track he recorded for Uh-Oh. The album starts out on a high and continues to move. From "Now I'm Your Mom" to "Somebody," the bongos, congas, maracas and clarinet seem to be suggesting a different type of music that can provide positive feelings as a result of David Byrne's unique vision of what modern music can be.

Swedish duo Roxette talk about pop music

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

David J. Criblez spoke to Per Gessle and Marie Fredriksson of Roxette in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

"The first time is always the sweetest." For Roxette this phrase rings true. Touring the world in their debut concert tour dubbed, "Join the Joyride Around the World 91-92," supporting their latest LP, Joyride, the Swedish pair has a lot on their hands. But they seem to handle the pressure with ease. Being introduced to record company executives, to photographers and to fans, their hair stands on end without a bottle of spray.

After a backstage toast to their arrival in Philadelphia, led by area representatives, they look puzzled, realizing they must be in America, because they are toasting with domestic beer.

VILLANOVAN: The term 'hook' is often used when describing pop music and has been used various times when describing Roxette's music. In your opinion, what makes a hook?

GESSLE: "You search for something unique, something that grabs you that goes from the initial brainwork to the finished product. The sound, production, the music and the voice must hold a sound that will remain fresh, so that you'll want to hear it again."

V: Originally, when you started as Roxette with "Pearls of Passion," how would you describe your style then?

GESSLE: "Sort of the same but more ... varied. It didn't follow a straight line because we came from such different backgrounds and separate careers. Our sound at that point was up in the air. Joyride was totally different in the respect that it was specially written for live performances. Therefore, it was more guitar-oriented. We knew what we wanted to do ... it was that simple."

V: Your album, Look Sharp, came straight out of nowhere making Roxette an instant success and a hot radio band. To what do you attribute this?

GESSLE: "I wish I knew. We appeal to a lot of different people. Our audience ranges from 15- to 50-year-olds. There has to be a need for something before it happens and I guess there was a need for a band like Roxette at the time. Nobody's doing what we do and that's strange because we are doing a very traditional thing."

V: Do you think your ascendance has a lot to do with your popular stylings?

GESSLE: "Yeah, it has to do with the sound. When Look Sharp sold six million copies, people told us, 'well, now you should go to L.A. and record with a big name producer' and we said 'no.' We wanted to stay home in Sweden with our band and family. That is all part of our sound. I think it has a lot to do with the fact that we are not from New York or London."

V: Is the story about the American exchange student bringing a Roxette CD to U.S. radio (Roxette's first two LPs were initially only released in Europe) true? Is that how it all started?

GESSLE: "Yeah, that is not exactly how it all started but that story is true. He obviously was a big Roxette fan and went up to a radio station in Minneapolis with the CD. It remained in a pile until programmer Brian Phillips, who is now in Philadelphia, called his attention to it due to its newspaper type of cover. He played the first cut, "The Look," and people kept calling in requesting it. The reason why our records were not released here is because many record companies told us that we were too European. They were wrong ... thank God. People wrote us off as a one-hit-wonder but we had more to offer with our other singles, 'Dressed for Success,' 'Listen to Your Heart,' 'Dangerous' and "It Must Have Been Love.' "

V: What was your affiliation with Marie, originally. How did you initially get together?

GESSLE: "We met in the '70s. We were in different bands at the time but shared the same rehearsal studios. She was from the town I was born in. Everyone knew each other. My band, Gyllene Tider, became successful. Marie did backing vocals on our last tour but blossomed into her own solo career, which was highly successful. When we finally did Roxette, we were both taking a risk leaving our well-established

Mellencamp acts and directs with 'Grace'

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

FALLING from GRACE

Singer/songwriter/performer and now actor/director, John Mellencamp has always kept his head out of the clouds and placed himself in the hearts of middle class America. He is not a pompous stud whose first and foremost concerns are the condition of his hair and his sultry smile. Mellencamp paints portraits, sad or happy, of real life emotions in a harsh world of missed opportunities. In doing so, he has not forgotten his roots. "Falling From Grace," his first movie, is a Mellencamp portrait that runs parallel with his own walk of life in Bloomington, Ind.

Bud Parks (Mellencamp) is an established country music star and hometown hero in Indiana where he and his California wife (Mariel Hemingway), and daughter (played by Mellencamp's real life daughter, Teddy Jo) head for a celebration of his grandfather's 80th birthday. Grandpa Parks, as he rides about on the motorcycle Bud gave him, has a spice for life that also involves an eye for young ladies. Here the descension of Bud's happy-go-lucky personality kick is shown.

Relaxed in his home town, Bud takes comfort in his temporary retirement from the glitzy city life. However, he becomes too far removed and falls straight back into the groove that he once catapulted out of years before. His relationship with his brother (Brent Huff) and his distant big shot father (Claude Akins) remain cold. But trouble ensues when he begins to flounder about with his old girlfriend (Kay Lenz), now his brother's wife, who is also sleeping with his father.

Dazed and confused, Bud refuses to go back to California, losing his wife and child to adulterous ways and immature temper tantrums. Lonely and alone, Bud gets rejected by being used by his high school sweetheart, punched out by his father and told off by his sister (Deirdre O'Connell). Bud begins his spiral downwards leading to his nearly fatal fall.

Mellencamp and his supporting cast paint this portrait with down-home charm and real emotion. His style is simplistic and open from the first scene. Contrary to other rock star movie transitions, Mellencamp refuses to showboat but rather plays this one straight from the heart.

Movie Clips

BLAME IT ON THE BELLBOY: Dudley Moore, Bryan Brown and Bronson Pinchot lead a cast of ridiculous characters staying at an Italian villa. Pinchot provides a boring replica of his television role. This unfunny farce does nothing successfully except insult the viewer's intelligence. D

GLADIATOR: Directed by Rowdy Herrington, this story is about Tommy Riley (James Marshall of Twin Peaks fame), who becomes involved in Chicago's illegal amateur boxing underworld. After leaving an uncaring father (John Heard), Tommy turns to Horn (Brian Dennehy), the boxing promoter eager to make money from Tommy's fighting ability. Basically a "Rocky" copy, Gladiator's strengths lie in its cast and the powerful fight scenes. B—

THE LAWNMOWER MAN: This film, based on a 1978 Stephen King short story, explores the nightmarish possibilities of psychological experiments in the computer age. An alcoholic scientist (Pierce Brosnan) creates "virtual reality" and uses it to take a human subject (Jeff Fahey) beyond the normal realm of mental capabilities. The result is a modern day Frankenstein tale with a high-tech computer graphics twist. B

WAYNE'S WORLD: Everyone's favorite "Saturday Night Live" skit hits the big screen with Mike Myers and Dana Carvey reprising their roles as Wayne and Garth. The comic duo is amusing and childlike as they must decide whether or not to sell their TV show "Wayne's World" to a yuppie (Rob Lowe) from a major network. The plot lacks substance but the laughs are abundant. B

The blues reign in Philly

By SINEAD QUINN
Senior Reporter

Like the song that made her famous, Koko Taylor and her Blues Machine pitched a "Wang Dang Doodle" at the Chestnut Cabaret. From the time she walked on stage to the time she donned her purple robe, Koko Taylor made it clear why she is the Queen of the Blues.

While an audience with the "Queen" was the highlight of the show, Alligator Records' Twentieth Anniversary Tour featured four other national acts including The Lonnie Brooks Blues Band and Katie Webster. This was a veritable blues feast in the blues-starved city of Philadelphia — and no one present went home hungry.

The four-hour show included not only the best of the music that Alligator Records has to offer, but a wide sampling stylistically.

Lil' Ed Williams and the Blues Imperials opened the show. Lil' Ed got the crowd going with some bottleneck blues on his slide guitar. Katie Webster's energetic style of playing blues piano is no doubt influenced by her many years touring the "crayfish circuit" of Dallas to New Orleans. The highlight of her set was her encore performance of "Two-fisted Mama."

This was a veritable blues feast in the blues-starved city of Philadelphia.

Lonnie Brooks electrified the audience with his own style of Chicago/Lousiana Blues. His sound was the most electric of the group. Songs like "Be My Wife Tonight" definitely delivered what he calls "Bayou blues with a rock and roll chaser."

Elvin Bishop's country-fried blues exemplified what is often the best part of the blues — the humor. He had no sooner finished his song lamenting his encounter with a beer-drinking woman that left him broke, then he was barking like a dog in a touching tribute to his four-legged friend.

"We don't mean any harm," he apologized, "We just don't know any better."

And when Koko Taylor walked on stage — all five feet of her — it did not seem possible that a voice so deep and gritty could come from this grandmother in her mid-60's. But she belted out each song with every once of her soul. She sang "I'm a Woman" (her version of the Bo Diddley tune) with such energy and spirit, it brought new meaning to what it is to be a woman.

The entire Alligator Records crew came on stage for a final jam, performing "Sweet Home Chicago," and thanking Alligator Records for keeping the blues alive.

Grateful Dead conquer Philadelphia again

The Grateful Dead came to life at the Spectrum March 16, 17 and 18.

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"Selling tickets for Detroit!" "Excuse me sir, but you've been caught by the Dead Patrol," and "Anybody got a pipe?" are comments out of the ordinary but rather common place at Grateful Dead shows. In fact nothing the Dead, or Deadheads, do is ordinary in any respect causing their tie-dyed three night stand, March 16-18, at the Spectrum to act as more of an event than a concert.

The Bay Area dinosaur rockers simply appeared on stage without any big introduction kicking sweetly and softly into "Let the Good Times Roll" leading straight into "Feel Like a Stranger."

Unfortunately the first set seemed to be in a bit of a funk as some of the songs such as "Friend of the Devil" and "Black Throated Wind" got garbled. However, the band began to pick up towards the set's end in perhaps the evenings best musical endeavor, "Ramble on Rose."

Bruce Horsby filled in on piano for the entire show pairing keys with Vince Welnick on synthesizer for the second set's "Scarlet Begonias" and "Fire on the Mountain." Meanwhile, drummer/percussionists Mickey Hart and Bill Kreutzmann collaborated on one of their infamously long, sometimes tedious, solos. But Garcia came through with "Morning Dew" followed by Weir's low key encore of Chuck Bery's "Jonnie B. Goode."

The free-spirited audience provided the visual imagery. Decked out in standard Dead attire: bajas, love beads and, of course, tie-dye. They danced to the beat of their own drum on the floor, in the rafters and even in the hall ways evoking a bad version of "Hair." But what matters is not their rather earthy appearance but their 'dead'-dication and unity. These people are in their own Utopia. It almost seems that the music in the concert is merely a soundtrack backdrop of a rather large love-in at each arena and parking lots.

The Grateful Dead are an odd group with a distinct sound and technique. Despite their audience's overwhelming devotion, they fail to communicate with them verbally by not saying a word to them at all. It seems that they almost connect with them telepathically or simply through the music surrounding the Dead with more mystique and grace then any other musical act in history.

SET LIST 3/16/92: SET #1: "Let the Good Times Roll," "Feel Like a Stranger," "Friend of the Devil," "C.C. Rider," "Takes A Lot to Laugh," "Black Throated Wind," "Ramble on Rose," "Let It Grow."

SET #2: "Karita," "Scarlet Bognias," "Fire on the Mountain," "Estimated Prophet," Drum Solo, "All Along the Watchtower" and "Morning Dew."

ENCORE: "Johnnie B. Goode."

'Kings' vibrate sounds

By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

The '50s brought many fads to American popular culture, like the hoola hoop, poodle skirts, leather jackets and greasy hair. None was more vibrant or lasting than the mambo, a music and dance craze that swept the country early in the decade.

"The Mambo Kings" chronicles the lives of two gifted brothers, Cesar and Nestor Castillo. With dreams of fame and a new life, the pair arrive from Havana to make their contribution to the fresh latin music scene. Cesar (Armand Assante) is a lusty seducer whose love for life is matched only by his love for his brother.

Shy but incredibly talented, Nestor (Antonio Banderas) cannot fully recover from a crushing relationship with a beautiful girl from Havana, named Maria. She serves as a symbol of everything the brothers have left behind and becomes the inspiration for the Mambo Kings' most famous song, "Beautiful Maria of My Soul."

The Castillo brothers capture the essence of the American dream: they live in poverty, but work hard and eventually find overwhelming success. Their music burns with the passion of their experiences, with each note describing the gamut of human emotion, from joy to despair, from torment to true love.

At one point, the group locates success by being discovered by Desi Arnaz, star of the most popular show on television, "I Love Lucy." Their major role on one episode and subsequent fame thrills Cesar, but leaves Nestor wondering whether the sacrifices they have made are worth the pain. The contrasting personalities of the two brothers provide dramatic and moving scenes that form the backbone of the film.

"The Mambo Kings" gives an entertaining and provocative glimpse at yet another "American Dream" story. It tends toward the sappiness common to such a movie, but its shocking climax and subsequent conclusion puts "The Mambo Kings" into the realm of more serious drama. The strength of the film lies in its soundtrack, which includes all the pulsating and powerful Latin music that the Castillo brothers perform. Tito Puente, called "The King" of Latin music, plays four of the album's tracks. Celia Cruz, Duke Ellington and Linda Ronstadt also contribute to the effort.

"The Mambo Kings" could have very easily relied on its music to carry it as a decent movie. It uses dialogue and characterization to raise it above just another musically-based flick bent on reviving fond memories. "The Mambo Kings" combines spirited mambo with actual plot, and earns itself respectability.

FAST FORWARD: Patrick Swayze returns as an idealistic American doctor in "City of Joy." Whether or not Swayze can convince as a savior of Calcutta's slums remains to be seen. The film opens April 3.

Nicholas Cage stars in the western drama, "Red Rock West," still in production. Cage enters the small town of Red Rock, Wyo., hoping to land a construction job, but is instead offered $5,000 to murder a bar owner's wife. Soon after, he is offered double to kill the same man by the owner's sultry wife. Cage tries to escape from the town with all the money and no "job" done when the real hitman (Dennis Hopper) shows up. "Red Rock West" is tentatively scheduled for a summer release.

REWIND: Danny DeVito impishly romps about in "Other People's Money," set to be released on video this week. The film focuses on a greedy corporate takeover artist, Larry "the Liquidator," as he attempts to dismantle a valuable but struggling New England cable factory. Penelope Ann Miller co-stars as the beautiful opposition lawyer, and Gregory Peck returns as an aging but dignified tycoon. Showcasing the comic talents of DeVito, "Other People's Money" entertains with humor and genuine romance.

"Twenty-one" stars Patsy Kensit in a movie that has not received much respect. The reason: the film follows a young woman to muddle through adultery and relationships, scantily-clad all the while. Kensit gets lost among the pretentious scenes overwrought with gritty reality and an Irish brogue. Not a truly pretty picture for St. Patty's Day.

CLIPS: "Sweetie" is a humorous Australian love/hate story about two sisters, one who has uninhibited fun and another who is afraid of her own shadow. "Sweetie" will be at the Connelly Center Cinema Saturday, March 28, at 7 p.m., Sunday, March 29, at 3:30 and 7 p.m. and Monday, March 30, at 7 p.m.

Spinal Tap fails royally

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

ROCK QUARRY

The Tap is back ... but unfortunately it has run dry. Spinal Tap, the fictitious heavy metal clown group featured in Rob Reiner's 1982 film, "This is Spinal Tap," has returned, after 10 years none the less, with a new LP, Break Like The Wind.

Although Spinal Tap has become a music industry joke, when referring to a moronic band that is old and falling apart, there seems to be a cult of fans out in the great wide open that appreciate them. Well, everybody appreciates a good joke ... when delivered with style. But style is something Tap overshoots on their lagging new album.

The soundtrack to their movie worked well due to its comical over-blown lyrics colored with raunchy metal that took the backseat as Tap's vehicle drove strictly on humorous appeal. With Wind the roles are reversed ... for the worst. The band tries to actually be a metal band instead of doing what Spinal Tap was made for, mocking.

Members guitarist Nigel Tufnel (Christopher Guest), singer/guitarist David St. Hubbins (Michael McKeanon) and Derek Smalls (Harry Shearer) are pushing it. They start off strong with their first single, "Bitch School" whose stripes evoke the old Tap recipe. But each track following it evokes a wall of noise without a yuk.

Several guests such as Cher, Dweezil Zappa, Jeff Beck, Slash (Guns N'Roses) and Joe Satriani appear but merely confuse things especially on the title track that has Satch, Beck and Slash all soloing simultaneously creating nothing but a whirlwind of chords that go by so fast that its impossible to enjoy.

The album does show two other hints of Tap's past on "Christmas With the Devil" and "All the Way Home." These two songs were featured only in an accapella snippet from the movie ("Home" also the first collaboration from Tufnel and St. Hubbins) and from a rare Xmas single ("Devil"). This just proves that instead of trying to improve their musicality, Tap should focus on the original essense of the band, namely comedy.

The Commitments, yet another movie band, also returns with their own second release Vol. 2. Here leftovers and new tracks appear from the movie of the same name.

One of the more disappointing aspects about this compilation is that lead siger Andrew Strong, is only featured on five of the 11 tracks. His sheer energy on "Land of a Thousand Dances," "Grits Ain't Groceries" and "Show Me" are entertaining but are nowhere near as powerful as the heat he created on "Try A Little Tenderness" or "Mustang Sally" on Vol. 1.

This entry into the Commitments short storybook fails to be as colorful as the last, but this is expected as this album runs along the lines of More Dirty Dancing and Urban Cowboy II. In a sentence, the record company that put out the original soundtrack issues a quickly thrown together follow up, through the motives of greed, to ride along side the success of the first. Usually it's a bit of a trap but Vol. 2 is a lot better than a majority of the music that is currently plaguing the charts.

SINGLE SPOTLIGHT: Metallica breaks through with a bitter tasting ballad, "Nothing Else Matters." Although the band's heavy sound contrasts any form of ballad-like melodies, "Matters" is well conceived and rises above cliches such as Extreme's "More Than Words" or Mr. Big's "To Be With You." Metallica refuses to turn to mush but rather stands their ground as today's music's most stubborn and aggressive outfit.

PEBBLES: The Black Crowes' new album, Southern Harmony Musical Companion, will see the light of day this May. The band will embark on their "High as the Moon" tour this summer to theaters across the U.S. The Crowes will have Indian or Afghan musicians open the show. As for their own music, it wil continue to fall within the Rolling Stones/Faces/Gram Parsons/Leon Russell style that make these Crowes fly ... Def Leppard will soon be out and running with Adrenalize. They will start it off with "Let's Get Rocked" as the lead off single. Former producer/writer/mentor/near band mate, Robert "Mutt" Lange is not in on this play, hopefully the Leps can still score without getting flagged ... Lollapulooza II, runned by Jane's Addiction's Perry Farell, unleashed its line-up this week. The bill will consist of: Ice Cube, Jesus and Mary Chain, SoundGarden, Pearl Jam and will be headed by the Red Hot Chili Peppers. Former candidates for the bill, Public Enemy and the Beastie Boys, have said to decline the offer.

.38 Special fires honest rock at Cabaret

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

After 15 years of playing together, .38 Special have developed a collaborative attitude which enhances their music and continues to win them fans all over the United States. The band has a popular sound encompassing a variety of ballads and guitar-laden tracks. It has been described as "a balance of thunder and grace." Such chart toppers as "Hold On Loosely," "Caught Up In You," "Back Where You Belong," and their biggest hit to date, "Second Chance," have firmly established .38 Special on the American music scene and have generated a loyal following.

Guitarist Jeff Cartisi, keyboardist Max Carl, singer Donny Van Zant, guitarist Danny Chauncey and drummer Larry Junstorm joined forces with producer Rodney Mills on thier most recent creation, Bone Against Steel. Undeniably honest songwriting is the strongest feature of all of .38 Special's ventures. This trait continues on Bone Against Steel with songs like "Rebel to Rebel," which has an American hero theme and a simple yet powerful beat.

.38 Special's guitar-oriented sound is best enjoyed in an intimate atmosphere where the acoustics can shine without being overpowered by a complex set or abundantly amplified drums. They are a band with down-to-earth appeal who avoid glitz to concentrate instead on creating a unified interaction of musical talents. They will be featured at the Chestnut Cabaret March 25.

FLASH: Opening for .38 Special is the Southern-based Webb Wilder. Webb Wilder is the name of a man, a band, and a short movie. The man was born in Mississippi, grew up playing with an American Legion Hall band, and ended up forming the band whose sound have been described as "interplanetary southern roots rock." Wilder's name also functioned as part of the title of a film short called "Webb Wilder, Private Eye," which gained a cult following on the USA network's "Night Flight" show.

Unusual is an appropriate synonym for rock quartet Webb Wilder due to the lyrics of their newest release, Hybrid Vigor. Song topics range from a soulful tribute to skinless inhabitants of the afterlife in "Skeleton Crew" to a circus worker who obtains his moment of fame on "The Tonight Show" in "Human Cannonball." Their humorous attitude reverberates throughout all the tracks on Hybrid Vigor and their debut effort, It Came From Nashville.

Another musical jewel of the South, The Radiators, will perform at the Chestnut Cabaret March 28. The New Orleans-based band combines the diverse sounds of an electric harp called the ombichord, Memphis horns, an organ, and the traditional 12-string acoustic guitar. Ed Volker, Dave Malone and Camile Boudin provide the powerful vocals with Reggie Scanlon on bass, Frank Bua on drums and Glenn Sears doing percussion.

Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers will arrive at the 23 East Cabaret March 27 and 28. The gritty rock group was featured at Villanova last year.

careers behind. But we wanted to branch out into English."

V: The songs seem more full on Joyride. Was that your approach? (As Gessle begins to answer, Marie gracefully walks in and sits beside me diving into the interview as if she is striving to catch up on what she has missed.)

GESSLE: "Bigger sound and well produced. We spent hours on just the title song alone. We tried to push Roxette as far as it could go, at this point, making it as smooth as possible."

V: How do you remove yourself from all the hype and pressure and not let that overtake or affect your creative side?

FREDRIKSSON: "We have been doing this for such a long time. You establish a certain amount of confidence in yourself. It's not like the first time. You know you can do it. Plus we are surrounded by people that we have worked with for so long that we are relaxed and comfortable with the atmosphere."

GESSLE: "Returning to Sweden and recording there is an escape as well. You get away from all the pressure. Plus, records in Sweden disappear very quickly so you don't feel that overwhelming success."

V: On your album you have an interesting statement, 'Don't bore us, get to the chorus.' Is this your theme or creed?

FREDRIKSSON: "Oh. That was sort of an inside joke with our manager. We were driving around one day and in America you have these l-o-n-g rap 12" mixes that go on forever. So our manager shouted it out one day and it kind of stuck with us. Per even has it printed on his guitar picks."

V: What type of music influences your vocals (directed to Marie)?

FREDRIKSSON: "I love R&B. I love to listen to old blues because I love to improvise myself. Our song "Soul Deep," (a song off Joyride that originally appeared on their first LP) is my outlet to that type of music."

V: What was the band Mama's Barn and what was your affiliation with them (directed to Marie)?

FREDRIKSSON: "It was my first band that I got a record deal with. I was only 19 at the time. But it was just before I went into my solo career. Then I jumped into Roxette because I wanted to write more and share a large part of the creative input with others."

V: The theme of love seems to be rather frequent throughout your songs such as 'the Big L,' 'Hot-blooded' and '(do you get) Excited?' Is love your biggest inspiration?

GESSLE: "It's the most important thing in life. When you write a lyric you not only want it to reflect your opinions, but be able to communicate with others as well. Love is identifiable to all. It's a language we all understand, whether negative or positive."

A season of ups and downs

By JASON CARNEY
Staff Reporter

Thirteen seconds to play, down two to the Orangemen. Lance Miller gets the ball, slashes left down the lane and throws up an off-balance shot over Autry . . .

What was to follow seemed to last a lifetime. As the ball remained in the air for five seconds, a myriad of players relentessly went after it before it settled into the arms of Syracuse's Dave Johnson and amazingly, Villanova's NCAA hopes came to a sudden halt.

Didn't Syracuse know that this is March Madness? Villanova's time to once again shine and show the rest of the country that its brand of ball is at its finest. What about the past six straight Big East victories that caused a lot of skeptics to hop on the 'Nova bandwagon? Miami, Seton Hall, Miami again, Pitt, Providence and Syracuse each dropped in succession, and with each passing conquest Villanova supporters could not help but wonder if their Cats could sneak into the field of 64. Unfortunately, their dreams were dashed.

Coach Rollie Massimino has stated that his '91-'92 edition was on a "mission" and they were one of the most enjoyable teams he has coached in recent memory. He faces a difficult task next season since he must replace his three captains. In Greg Woodard he loses a player who consistently hit the open outside shot and softened the defense. Marc Dowdell provided a stabilizing influence whose passing ability and outside shooting touch aided the team's attack. Chris Walker, the Cat's floor general from Texas, will be sorely missed for his feistiness and ability to step up and hit the big shot.

However, the Wildcats' cupboard is not bare. Second-team all-Big East guard Lance Miller returns for his senior season along with center James Bryson, who must prove he can play consistently as well as he did at the end of the season.

Arron Bain and Calvin Byrd will each be expected to pick up the scoring slack and big things will be expected from Temple transfer Jonathan Haynes at point guard. Villanova also has an incoming recruiting class of four, where point guard Lawrence Thomas and 6-foot-4 shooting guard Roscoe Harris should step in immediately and become impact players.

Much was expected of this year's seasoned Cats. Next year's unit may benefit being away from the limelight. They still have a veteran nucleus. Without the pressures of being picked to finish high in the Big East conference, they could flourish.

It's tough to look at this year's club without wondering, "what if?" Villanova had too many valleys and not enough peaks. The Cats were virtually eliminated after they came out of the gate with an abysmal 2-6 start. The lows came in the form of losses to Hawaii, LaSalle and a season opening blowout to Houston. The frustration culminated in the middle of February with Villanova's worst loss ever in the Big East at the hands of Boston College.

'Nova's talented club picked its spots when showcasing its ability. A breathtaking two-point loss to perennial power Alabama, a sweep over regular season champion Seton Hall and dominance against Syracuse displayed 'Nova ball at its best.

A tough 3-2 matchup zone that would lead to a controlled fast-break or a half-court motion offense that worked the shot clock perfectly was a hallmark for success. Also, keeping the opponent's score under 70 points seemingly guaranteed a win.

Villanova probably finished two victories short of making the big dance. The NIT is not embarrassing. Yet, it is like kissing your sister. Villanova will surely give its best in the tournament, but the same excitement isn't generated as in the NCAAs.

Thus, basketball fervor will soon die down along the Main Line until next fall, when each V.U. fan can again get excited for another season of Wildcat ball. Until then one only wonders "what if . . . "

Miller gets the ball with the clock winding down, he slashes left down the lane and throws up an off-balance shot over Autry and . . .

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

Women's Swimming Team

The Cats capped off their best season ever by winning the Big East Championship and dethroning Pittsburgh, the champion for the last 11 years. In what was a total team effort, Nova overcame a deficit heading into the final day of the competition to pull away from second-place Miami by 42 points. All 18 team members earned points in the meet. Lisa Flood was named the Outstanding Woman Performer for the second consecutive year.

A young team, the Cats should again challenge the nation's elite next season when they will attempt to defend their first-ever Big East crown. Only two seniors will graduate, leaving 'Nova with a promising future for years to come.

Softball starts 2-0

By ED WASIELEWSKI
Assistant Sports Editor

Chalk up two wins for the softball team.

Opening the 1992 season on the road at West Chester University, 'Nova swept the Rams in a doubleheader to start its new campaign 2-0.

Head Coach Maria DiBernardi and the Cats used a five-run fourth inning to defeat W.C.U. in the first game 7-4. Junior pitcher Amy Meisinger capably handcuffed the Rams, giving up just two earned runs on five hits. Meisinger went the distance and earned her first victory of the season.

The Cats took a 6-0 lead into the bottom half of the fourth when West Chester rallied for four runs. With a tenuous 6-4 lead, 'Nova shut out the Rams the rest of the way to secure the win. Junior catcher Sharon Palmieri, 2-for-4 with one RBI, and sophomore Dina Squilanti, 1-for-2 with two runs scored, paced the offense.

In the second game, the Cats scored two runs in the sixth inning to beat West Chester 6-5 in a game shortened by darkness.

Up 2-0 after one inning, sophomore pitcher Michele Martin surrendered six hits in the second as the Rams seized a 4-2 lead. In a back and forth game, the Cats notched two runs in each the fourth and sixth for a two-run lead.

In the bottom frame of the sixth, the host Rams reached Martin for one run before Meisinger came in to retire the side. Meisinger stranded two runners and saved the victory for Martin.

Once again, Palmieri (2-for-4, one RBI) and Squilanti (2-for-2, two runs) led the Cats attack.

In its next game, 'Nova travels to Long Island for a matchup against Hofstra University tomorrow at 3 p.m.

Lady Cats trounce Eastern 16-2

By ALEX SCOFIELD
Staff Reporter

With or without spring-like weather, the Villanova women's lacrosse team was ready to begin the 1992 season one week ago. After a pair of games on bitterly cold days, the Wildcats warmed up for the upcoming season with a split. After clobbering Eastern College in the season opener 16-2, the Wildcats lost to nationally-ranked University of Vermont by a score of 11-6.

With a convincing win already in their pockets, the stickwomen hosted UVM, the No. 20 team in the country. "[The Catamounts] play strong ball and they're very fast," said Villanova Head Coach Moira Lewis.

For the first 10 minutes of the game, Vermont bewildered the Wildcats with its speed and unorthodox playing style. Forsaking their assigned positions, the UVM players clustered wherever the ball was, at 10:03 into the first half, Vermont held a 5-1 lead over Villanova.

At various intervals throughout the rest of the game, 'Nova was able to exploit the strategy employed by UVM. Villanova attack-woman Monica Hopson broke free from the crowded competition on a coast-to-coast dash and netted a goal midway through the first half. Less than a half-minute later, 'Nova's Kelly Morley caught the Catamounts off guard when she put one between the pipes, narrowing UVM's lead to 5-3.

However, Vermont's Carrie Towers was unstoppable throughout the game. Every time Villanova scored, Towers was able to answer with a quick-stick goal or a bounce shot. Her five goals made the difference as the Catamounts took the contest.

The matchup against Eastern College March 13 proved to be a mismatch. Though the Eagles were able to put up a fight for the first ten minutes of the game, they were absolutely punchless afterwards. The Wildcats extended a 10-2 halftime lead into a 16-2 rout by game's end.

Starring for the Cats in the season opener was junior Leigh Ann Leone, last year's leading goal-scorer with 27. In the second half, she moved at will through the Eastern defense, prompting high praise from Lewis. "Leigh Anne is very intelligent when she goes to the goal," said Lewis. "She's a good cutter — real strong and determined.

Another early-season leader on the squad has been Hopson. In the UVM game she found many ways to outsmart the Catamount game-plan. Early in the second half, she was on the receiving end of a passing sequence and bolted downfield and one one-on-one matchup against the lone Vermont fired a low screen shot through the UVM defense that caught Vermont's goalie Rachel Bischoff completely off-guard.

"I'm very happy with the way we've played," said Lewis after the second game. "They know where each other is going to be on the field and they're playing together like a team."

Villanovan hosts the University of New Hampshire tomorrow and then plays on the road for two games.

Tennis begins strong

The 1992 men's tennis team is hoping to emulate the success of last year's squad, which went 15-5. Dr. Robert Langran is back for his 26th season as coach of the Cats with a career record of 309-170 entering this season. Langran also has coached the women's tennis team for the past 24 seasons.

'Nova is coming off a 5-2 victory over Haverford College March 16. The match was originally scheduled to be played at the St. Mary Courts at Villanova but was moved indoors to Haverford due to inclement weather.

Senior Mark Pizzi earned a victory in his No. 1 singles match. Last season, Pizzi posted an overall record of 18-2, including a 17-2 mark at No. 3 singles.

Tom Boutrous registered a win at No. 2 singles to pick up where he left off last season. Boutrous went an impressive 16-3 at No. 2 singles last year as a freshman. He also plays No. 2 doubles for the Cats.

Senior Stephen Forrest lost at No. 3 singles. He is making the jump from No. 5 singles, where he had a 14-4 mark last season. Like Boutrous, Forrest also plays doubles, combining with Dan DaRos to form the No. 1 doubles team.

At No. 4 singles, Brian Cavalier gave the Cats their third win of the match. Andy Sullivan scored a victory at No. 5 singles to hand the Cats a 4-1 advantage over Haverford.

Forrest and DaRos sealed the match with their victory at No. 1 doubles. The No. 2 and 3 doubles matches were not played due to a scheduling conflict.

The Cats are returning eight of their top ten performers from last season. With that experience they combine a core of talented underclassmen to form a potentially solid team.

"I think we are a deep, solid team," said Forrest. "We have a good team and we should be able to give anybody, any team, a good match."

The Cats will try to maintain their early success today when they host Colgate University at 2 p.m. The action continues tomorrow when 'Nova travels to South Orange, N.J., to play the Pirates of Seton Hall. The Cats will be back home to host New York University March 22 at 12 p.m.

Men's lax falls to Penn, PSU

By BOB TRAVISANO

After two rousing victories over Michigan and Notre Dame, the men's lacrosse team fell back to earth with two straight defeats. The first loss was a 9-7 heartbreaker to University of Pennsylvania and the most recent was a 16-8 drubbing at the hands of Penn State.

The Penn affair was a close game for the first three quarters, with Villanova dictating the tempo. In the final period, Villanova made a few costly errors and could not clear the ball and allowed No. 15 Penn back into the game. 'Nova was down only one goal, 8-7, with one minute left when it pulled its goalie to bolster its offense, leaving an open net. Penn iced the game with a score.

Still hurting from the tough loss three days before, 'Nova seemed affected early in the game as Penn St. raced to a five goal lead. 'Nova pulled to within two later in the half before Penn St. kicked into an overdrive which the Cats could not catch, enroute to the defeat. Another downside to this loss was when Sean Haggerty, an explosive goal-scorer, went down with a knee injury early in the first half. Junior Brian Cash, though, stepped in at goalie and had some excellent saves in defeat. As of this game Penn St. was ranked 18th in the national poll.

Leading the Wildcat offensive attack this season is senior midfielder Sean Haggerty with eight goals and three assists, followed by Jason Foote with eight goals and two assists and sophomore Rick Bontatibus with five goals and five assists. Other noteworthy performers are Tom Anderson, Sol Mahoney, Scott Chisholm and Doug Deroucher. Also, freshman Brian Goger looks to be a future threat with the offense.

Men struggle in NCAAs; Gariba out with injury

By LARRY LANZA
Staff Reporter

After heading into the meet in position for a strong team showing, an injury and a dropped baton resulted in the Villanova men's track team being shut out at the NCAA Indoor Championships March 13-14 at the Hoosier Dome in Indianapolis.

Having arrived as one of the top five entrants in the 55-meter dash, junior Salaam Gariba became the first Wildcat disappointment just prior to his second qualifying heat. It was at that time that Gariba was forced to withdraw from the 55-meter competition due to problems with a hamstring he had injured a week earlier at the IC4A Championships.

Prior to withdrawing, Gariba had run a 6.29 in the quarterfinals to finish fourth in his heat and qualify for the semifinals. The eventual winner of the finals was Michael Green of Clemson, who ran 6.08 to outrun the rest of the field.

The Wildcats' 4x800-meter relay also entered the meet with a chance to win. Through the semifinals, those chances remained intact as junior Brad Sumner anchored the Cats with a 1:48 final half-mile leg to lead 'Nova into the finals with a 7:20 qualifying time.

In the finals things continued to go well for Villanova through the first three legs. Sophomore Michael Going cut through early traffic to take Villanova to a 1:52 start on the opening half-mile leg. Freshman Louie Quintana and senior Finn Kelly then followed with back-to-back 1:49 legs to set up Sumner on the anchor.

On the anchor leg the bad luck struck. While running in a pack of five runners battling for second place behind leading Florida, Sumner had the baton kicked from his hand by the heel of another runner. Before Sumner had regained the baton, a gap of over 70 meters from the group had developed and 'Nova's hopes had ended.

The Cats went on to finish seventh in 7:32, while Florida took the title in 7:18.

"It's unfortunate because you don't see many dropped batons," said Head Coach Marty Stern, "so if it doesn't happen often, and we just dropped one, I guess we won't drop one for a while."

Villanova's only other competitor in the championship was junior Terrence Mahon, who finished seventh in the 5000-meter in 14:11, 30 seconds behind winner Jon Brown of Iowa St.

Mahon is currently preparing to run in the U.S. Olympic Trials Marathon April 11 in Columbus, Ohio.

This year's team title was again claimed by defending champion Arkansas. The Razorbacks collected 53 points to hold off a strong challenge by runner-up Clemson (46). Arkansas has now won the last two NCAA indoor championships as well as the last two NCAA cross-country championships. Only Tennessee's victory in last season's NCAA outdoor championships in Eugene, Ore. stands in the way of an Arkansas streak.

Finishing eight points behind Clemson in third was Florida, while LSU took fourth and Georgetown and UTEP tied for fifth. Rounding out the top 10 were North Carolina, Baylor, Iowa St., and, in a tie for 10th, Indiana, Ohio St., and SMU.

After a week off from competition, Villanova opens its outdoor season in California March 28 at UC-Irvine's Anteater Invitational.

Baseball rips Textile

By ANDY FITZPATRICK

In a span of one week, the 'Nova baseball team went from playing among the palm trees in sunny Florida to playing amidst snow flurries in wintry-like Pennsylvania. The weather change has brought out some good in the 4-7 Cats, as they have won three of their last four, including a 11-5 win over Philadelphia Textile.

"I'm happy with some, but overall things have not been good," said Head Coach George Bennett. "We've been getting spotty hitting and spotty pitching but can't seem to put the two together."

Against Textile March 17, the Cats were able to combine hitting with pitching in the victory. The win came on the heels of two one-run games, an 8-7 squeaker over LaSalle and a tough 7-6 road loss to rival St. Joseph's.

"We lost the game [against St. Joseph's] defensively by dropping three fly balls," said Bennett. "Against LaSalle it was just a matter of hanging on plus great relief help from freshman Dave Herr."

Bennett has been pleased with the play of outfielders Ryan McGinty and Dan Mariniello, second baseman Chris Massella and pitcher Larry Kingsbury. McGinty is leading the team with a .448 batting average and Kingsbury, who is pitching "better than ever" according to Bennett, has three of the team's four victories.

"Overall, we're playing erratically. Some are playing well but the rest have to concentrate," said Bennett.

This weekend the Cats will host conference foe St. John's in a three-game series, beginning Saturday with a doubleheader at noon.

As far as the Cats are concerned, they will take this cold weather over Florida's all Spring as long as the victories follow suit.

★★★★ Men's Week in Review ★★★

In what has been a down year for the conference, the Big East sent only five teams into the NCAA Tournament — Seton Hall, Syracuse, Georgetown, St. John's and Connecticut. In recent years, the Big East has been represented by six or seven schools. As further proof of the Big East's relatively low power rating, no conference member was seeded higher than fourth in their respective region. Normally a powerhouse, the conference commands at least a two or three seed for its best team annually.

In addition to the teams in the NCAAs, Villanova, Pittsburgh, and Boston College received bids to the National Invitational Tournament.

Seton Hall, the top seed in the Big East Tournament, was seeded fourth in the East Region. The Hall was matched up against Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference champion La Salle in a contest held yesterday. Should the Pirates (21-8) survive this game, they would most likely play fifth-seeded Missouri tomorrow.

In the Big East Tournament, Seton Hall was ousted by eventual champion Syracuse, 70-66, in the semifinals. In the quarterfinals, the Pirates defeated a scrappy Boston College squad after trailing by six at the half.

The Pirates have tournament experience, reaching the West Regional Final last season. In Terry Dehere and Jerry Walker, Seton Hall has a potent inside-outside combination. The Hall has been playing very well recently and should maintain this level in the tournament.

Prediction: If Dehere is consistent and guard Bryan Caver plays smart, Seton Hall should reach the Sweet 16, but they will not get past Duke.

Syracuse captured the Big East Championship and the sixth seed in the East Region. The Orangemen will play Ivy League champion Princeton tonight in Worcester, Mass. If the Orangemen can avoid being ambushed by the Tigers, they would most likely face upstart Massachusetts on Sunday.

Syracuse battled its way to the Big East Championship behind the strong play of Dave Johnson and its ability to win the close games. The Orangemen won their three contests by a total of nine points. In the championship game, Johnson drained a foul-line jumper over Alonzo Mourning with four seconds left to hand Syracuse a 56-54 victory against Georgetown and took the Big East crown.

Syracuse is a young team that feeds on emotion. The Orangemen rely heavily on the three-pointer and the play of Johnson. Under Coach Jim Boeheim, Syracuse has a history of underachieving in the NCAA Tournament. But this season the Orangemen have maximized their potential.

Prediction: Look for Syracuse to escape Princeton and possibly send UMass home early.

Georgetown was seeded sixth in the West Region and played South Florida yesterday. Should the Hoyas defeat the Big South champs, they would face the LSU/BYU winner on Saturday.

In the Big East Tournament, G'town lost to Syracuse in the finals after defeating St. John's in the semis, 68-64. Mourning added to his awards collection by being named the tournament's MVP. He set tournament records for total points (76) and free throws (38 for 52). It is only the second time that a player has won the award and not been on the championship team.

The Hoyas will advance only as far as Mourning can take them. Guards Joey Brown and Irvin Church must supply consistent outside scoring if G'town is to get past the second round.

Prediction: Georgetown has played well on the road all season and is another hard-working squad. But do not expect Mourning and Company to get past the second round.

St. John's has received the seventh seed in the Southeast Region and will play Tulane today. If the Johnnies prevail, they likely will face Oklahoma State, the region's second seed, Sunday.

St. John's defeated Connecticut in overtime before falling to Georgetown in the semifinals of the Big East Tournament. The Redmen have now lost two of their last three, both at Madison Square Garden.

St. John's has had a recent problem of converting its opportunities inside the lane. The Redmen must correct this quickly if they hope to survive in the NCAAs.

Prediction: Defense and Malik Sealy should propel St. John's past Tulane, but Byron Houston and Oklahoma State will prove to be too much in the second round.

Connecticut (19-9) has been seeded eighth in the Southeast Region and played Nebraska (19-10) yesterday. If UConn was successful, it would face top-seeded Ohio State tomorrow.

UConn was ousted in the quarterfinals of the Big East Tournament by St. John's in overtime. The Huskies have never regained the form that earned them a Top 10 ranking early in the season.

UConn played Nebraska without center Rod Sellers, suspended as a result of his behavior in a game against Duke in last year's NCAA Tournament.

Prediction: UConn will have probably lost already.

Cats fall 83-80 to Virginia in NIT

By ANDY FITZPATRICK
Sports Editor

This was not how seniors Marc Dowdell, Chris Walker and Greg Woodard wrote the ending to their illustrious careers at Villanova. If playing in the 55th Annual National Invitation Tournament was not enough of a blow, the 83-80 loss to Virginia Wednesday night at duPont Pavilion certainly was. But then again, it was a typical case of too little, too late for the 1991-92 Wildcats.

Trailing 78-67 with :48 remaining, the Cats put together another one of their patented comebacks that we have come to expect from this team. But like the rest of the season, this one was to fall short too as the season ended for 'Nova at a disappointing 14-15.

A Lance Miller basket and subsequent foul shot with :04 left would have sent the Cats into overtime. But that was not the case because the referee called the foul before the shot, thus sending Miller to the line with the Cats still down three.

"I thought I was shooting, but the ref said it was the correct call. He said I was on the floor," said Miller. 'Nova Head Coach Rollie Massimino took a similar view of the shot saying, "it looked good but that's not for me to decide."

"The official made a quick call," said Virginia Head Coach Jeff Jones. "I was just hoping he didn't change his mind."

Looking back at the final minute of action, it was truly amazing that 'Nova was even in that spot with the clock winding down anyway.

With :48 remaining in the game, the Cats were behind by 11 and looking to prolong the obvious by fouling. In a span of ten seconds, both seniors Marc Dowdell and Greg Woodard had received standing ovations from the sparse crowd for four solid seasons of basketball after fouling out. Little did they know, though, that fellow senior Chris Walker had other plans.

The senior floor general, who started the game with two 3-pointers, dished the ball to Lance Miller for a three. Still trailing by nine with :28, Arron Bain hit a lavup before the wild and crazy ending unfolded.

Cavalier guard Anthony Oliver stepped on the sideline, giving the Cats just the slightest bit of hope down seven with :20 left. Walker immediately canned another 3-pointer and after two free throws from Bryant Stith, drilled yet another, his seventh of the game. With :7.5 on the clock, Virginia had the ball and just needed to inbound it to draw a foul and secure the three-point lead.

> I thought I was shooting, but the ref said it was the correct call. He said I was on the floor.
> 'Nova guard Lance Miller

But Ted Jeffries panicked when looking for an open man and threw the ball in the outstretched hands of Miller. That set the stage for Miller's near heroics. Miller missed the first of two foul shots, as it went in-and-out, pretty much sealing the outcome. After missing the rim on the second attempt, the Cavaliers finally could breathe a sigh of relief, having barely escaped duPont with a first-round NIT win.

The loss overshadowed two outstanding efforts from both Walker and Miller. Walker had a total of 23 points, hitting seven of 11 3-pointers. Not to be outdone, Miller scored 20 of his 27 in the second half as the Cats slowly started to cut into the Cavs' 40-24 halftime advantage.

After a very sluggish first half in which the Cats shot just 34.8 percent and were outscored 23-2 at one point, they trimmed the lead to four with 11:03 left on a Woodard three. But a key turning point by Virginia shifted the momentum back to UVA.

Down 53-49, Miller drove the lane and drawing contact, lost the ball. But with no foul called, Virginia's Cory Alexander drilled a three to give the Cavs a seven-point lead instead of a possible two-point one. Withstanding that charge, Virginia was able to match 'Nova basket-for-basket until that fateful last minute.

Virginia was led by all-America candidate Bryant Stith's 29 points. But the 22 points by freshman Junior Burrough provided the Cavaliers with another lethal weapon. On the strength of Burrough's 22, Virginia outscored the Cats 40-14 in the paint.

"They're an NCAA team," said Massimino. "[Virginia's] a quality school of people with character."

"We could have packed our bags [playing in the NIT as opposed to the NCAAs], but as athletes you play and that's what we did. Overall, we competed nicely. We have tremendous kids and that's all that's important to us. If all we worried about was wins and losses, then I wouldn't be here," said Massimino.

This game was the final chapter in the careers of the three seniors, all of whom had an impact on the program and will graduate in May. Unfortunately, their senior seasons did not come close to what they had in mind, but in the words of Woodard, "things just don't always go the way you plan." You can say that again.

Women's track takes third in NCAAs; Zajac second in 5000

By MIKE AGOLINO
Staff Reporter

The Villanova women's track team capped another successful season with another strong performance in the NCAA Division I Track and Field Championships held in Indianapolis. The Cats finished third overall behind Florida and Stanford, marking the fifth time in the last six seasons that Villanova has finished among the top three women's track teams in the nation.

> From third place in the Big East [Championships] to third place in the NCAAs. When it counts, we're always there.
> Head Coach Marty Stern

Villanova's highest individual finish came in the 5000-meter run, where sophomore Carole Zajac placed second. Zajac set the pace for much of the race, leading until the final 250 meters. However, Iowa's Tracy Dahl passed Zajac late in the race to claim first place and Zajac took second with a time of 15:59.39. This marked the third straight second place finish for Zajac in NCAA competition. She placed second in both the 1991 NCAA Cross Country Championships and in the 10,000-meter event of the 1991 Outdoor Track Championships.

Villanova Head Coach Marty Stern was pleased with Zajac's performance. "Carole proved once again that she is one of America's great young distance runners with a PR [personal record] of 15:59.39. She obviously has a bright future, and we're all looking forward to the U.S. Olympic Trials in June."

In the mile, junior runner Nnenna Lynch finished third with a time of 4:39.32, her second-best performance ever. She improved upon her fourth place finish of 1991 and was the first American runner to finish the event.

"Nnenna gave her usual tremendous NCAA performance. She always seems to run big in big meets," said Stern.

Two Wildcat runners competed in the 3,000-meter event. Cheri Goddard and Kate Fonshell finished fourth and seventh, respectively. Goddard, who finished second in the 3,000-meter event last year, stayed with the leaders in a slow-paced final before she fell behind in the last 400 meters. Fonshell ran in the middle of the pack before making a late charge, but fell just short of a sixth-place finish, the minimum needed to score team points in the event.

Goddard returned to the track less than 20 minutes after the 3,000-meter race to lead off the 4x800-meter relay squad, which finished in fourth place. Lynch also returned to the track to run in the relay event along with junior runners Irene Ruopoli and Chris Gentile, and the relay squad finished in 8:38.75.

Stern was especially impressed by the way Lynch and Goddard came back. "We didn't tell Cheri she was running on the relay until 15 minutes before the race, and she responded like a champ. It was one of the most unselfish things a Villanovan has done in many years. Nnenna came back and ran a strong leg on the relay to help her team get third place overall. Without her and Cheri, this is not possible."

"This was a very upbeat meet for us, and every athlete ran well," said Stern. "From third place in the Big East [Championships] to third place in the NCAA's. When it counts, we're always there. Of all our high NCAA finishes, this was probably the most overachieving. I'm proud of all of these athletes." Villanova finished with 22 points, behind Florida (50 points) and Stanford (26 points). The rest of the top ten included Louisiana State, Providence, Wisconsin, Georgia Tech, Houston, Nebraska and Texas.

The team will take a week off before opening its 1992 outdoor season. The Cats will compete in the Anteater Invitational at the University of California-Irvine March 28.

Put on your shoes America, it is time to go dancing. The greatest sporting event known to humankind, the Big Dance, officially known as the NCAA Tournament, has commenced. To put it all in perspective, the following are 64 reasons that make the tourney so special:

1. Watching the Wildcats play! ... Kentucky and Arizona that is.
2. Vitale and Valvano. They're awesome baby!
3. It spares us the pain of watching Americans attempt to crack the Top 20 in any Winter Olympic event.
4. If you put a dollar down on Howard to be champs, and they win, you're a billionaire.
5. A possible second round matchup between Cowboys and Indians (Oklahoma St. vs. St. John's).
6. You may see Mourning, Day and Knight at anytime.
7. LSU's Shaquille O'Neal.
8. If Ohio St. wins it all, Villanova can claim to be the best because Seton Hall beat Ohio St., and 'Nova beat The Hall, twice.
9. If Duke wins it all, Villanova can make no claims because North Carolina lost to Duke, and 'Nova lost to North Carolina.
10. To see why college basketball rules over the NBA — it's one game of five-on-five instead of five games of one-on-one.
11. Athletes playing for pride, not money.
12. The fact that Campbell and Eastern Illinois made it into the Big Dance for the first time. Unfortunately, their partners (Duke, Indiana) do not have two left feet.
13. CBS on-court reporter Leslie Visser telling us that Kentucky will be trying to make a basket on its next possession.
14. Nicknames like the Blue Hens and names like Popeye Jones.
15. Ohio State's Jimmy Jackson.
16. CBS switching from game to game just in time so that you have no idea what the heck is going on.
17. It is colorful, like a rainbow, Orangemen, Yellow Jackets, Blue Devils, Green Wave, Redmen, Crimson Tide and Purple Aces — among others.
18. Robert Morris. I thought he graduated three years ago.
19. [illegible] UCLA's [illegible] and Murray.
20. Temple. [illegible] they beat this year that was any good.
21. Three weeks, 63 games.
22. Coaches worrying about O.P.P. (other people's pairings).
23. Missouri's Anthony Peeler.
24. Watching your best friend's team get knocked

Student Government hopefuls debate issues

Senate candidates grilled on issues

By LARISA EPATKO
News Editor

Thirteen candidates for the University Student Senate discussed their political ideas and answered campus issue-related questions at a debate held March 23 in the East Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

Students will vote for three Commerce and Finance senators, three Arts and Sciences senators and one each from Engineering, Nursing and Science at elections held April 1 on campus.

The four Commerce and Finance senatorial candidates cited University unity, updated computer centers on campus and student involvement as some of their major concerns.

Matt Brach, a junior accounting major, said the contact he had with alumni helped him decide to attend the University. He stressed unity and would organize events, such as an all-student basketbal game to "bring the students together as a whole," Brach said.

Kevin McGee of the Association of Commuting Students (ACS) asked Brach about getting off-campus and commuting students involved with the University. Brach said students have the perception that there is nothing to do on campus. "More publication and promotion of on-campus activities" would cure this, Brach added.

Sebastian Carrado, a junior accounting major, said his focus was on two things: holding a Commerce and Finance majors seminar for incoming freshmen and expanding the computer center at Bartley Hall.

The present Commerce and Finance forum does not address different majors, Carrado said in response to a question posed by Andrea Pagliughi, president of the Accounting Society, asking why the freshmen need an additional Commerce and Finance majors seminar.

Daniel Donovan, a junior accounting major, said the "core curriculum needs to be restructured and diversified." The Uni-

Presidential candidates discuss core curriculum, multiculturalism

What are your experiences in or out of Student Government, which will help you in office?

Ken Batchelor: "I was involved my freshman and sophomore years as a cabinet member, and this year I am currently a liberal arts senator. Besides that I think my involvement in other activities on campus such as the Blue Key Society, the Greek system, Campaign for Community and Big Brothers/Big Sisters offers a wide variety of interests for different students. I can voice a lot of the different feelings different students have because I am in contact with many of the students here on campus. I think an important part of that is my vice president is also the same way."

Scott McBride: "My experience in Student Government started in my freshman year. I was appointed to the External Affairs Committee, whose goal was to create an open relationship between the Villanova University community and the neighboring community. In my second year, I was appointed to the cabinet position of Alumni Representative, which was a new position. The idea behind that was to create communication between the students and the alumni. Through that, I started the Student Alumni Association which has created interaction between the students and the alumni. It has facilitated, in one respect, the Network Nights which bring the alumni on campus to meet students and give students the opportunity to give them resumes, take a business card; it is a connection which has resulted in a couple summer jobs and interviews for permanent positions. There have been a couple of them and there is going to be another formulated for the fall.

"This year, I again sat on the Cabinet as Alumni Representative. I also sat on three subcommittees of the University Senate; one of which was the Rank and Tenure Committee, one of which was Curriculum Committee of the Arts and Sciences school, and the third was the University Relations Committee."

Michael Zubey: "Many of my experiences are my leadership

Candidate debate for presidency

A panel of student leaders questioned candidates for Student Body president at a debate held March 24 at 8 p.m. in the Connelly Center Cinema.

The three candidates running for the office of president include Ken Batchelor, junior political science major; Scott McBride, junior political science and history major; and Michael Zubey, junior economics and psychology major with a minor in philosophy.

The discussion began with a brief opening statement by each candidate. "I want to bring Student Government to the students," said Batchelor in his opening remarks. Batchelor said that his running-mate Kathy Breen was also running for a senate seat in order to have a vote in the University Senate, a power that the vice-president of Student Government does not have.

McBride began his remarks by saying that he wants to "work with the administration and not against it."

"I am tired of student apathy," said Zubey. Zubey's running mate is Christine Cuesta.

After the opening statements, a panel of students posed a series of questions. The panel consisted of Dorothy Brandon, president of the Panhellenic Association; Tom Collins, editor-in-chief of the Villanovan; Michelle Damas, first vice-president of the Black Cultural Society; Michelle Gironta, former president of the Student Programming Council (SPC); Andrea McGovern, president of the Resident Student Association (RSA); Julie Meehan, president of the Blue Key Society; and Katie Roberts, Campaign for Community. The debate was moderated by Dr. Barbara Wall, O.P., director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Brandon began the round of questions by asking Zubey what the most pressing issue at the University is.

Zubey, a member of Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity, said that the "lack of understanding"

Student robbed on campus

By TOM COLLINS
Editor in Chief

A student was assaulted and robbed by four area college students in front of Connelly Center the night of March 21, according to Public Safety Investigator David Mann.

The four accused, Clifton Lockwood, Dwayne Lucas, William Henderson and David Nickerson, were taken into custody by Radnor Police Officer William Howe at 11:17 p.m. after Public Safety found the suspects along Lancaster Avenue less than 10 minutes after the incident.

The suspects were charged early the next morning after a bail interview. Lockwood was charged with robbery, theft by unlawful taking or disposition, defiant trespass and criminal conspiracy; Lucas was charged with robbery, theft by unlawful taking or disposition, simple assault, aggravated assault and defiant trespass and criminal conspiracy; Henderson and Nickerson were charged with robbery, defiant trespass and criminal conspiracy. The hearing date is still pending, but by Pennsylvania law it must occur within three to 10 days of the crime.

Michael Stinson, a sophomore mechanical engineering major from Doylestown, Pa., was walking from Sullivan Hall to his room at Simpson Hall at approximately 11 p.m. when he was confronted by the four students, all of whom attend Northeastern Christian College in Lower Merion. They conversed with Stinson before asking him to give them his watch. When he thought the men were joking, he refused. Lucas then struck Stinson on the right ear, knocking him to the ground. Stinson placed the watch on a bench outside the Center. Lockwood picked it up and the four men left the scene.

"I was walking home from Sullivan after visiting a friend," Stinson said. "And then these four men came up to me. One

VIENNA, Austria

Former Cold War opponents recently announced the decision of an "open skies" agreement that will now allow Russia, the United States and 22 other nations to perform surveillance lights over each other's territory.

Germany's envoy to the talks, Ruediger Hartmann, stated, "This is a historical occasion in arms control, and for the first time we negotiated with the Russians not as an enemy but as a partner."

The open skies treaty provides the ability for all signatory states to use surveillance plans to check military forces and actions on each other's land. Also under the treaty that was signed on Tuesday, each nation is given a quota of flights.

MAYS LANDING, N.J.

James C. Cherry, the former Black Panther who hid from the law for 20 years in Cuba, was recently sentenced to life in prison for the 1970 murder of a police officer in Atlantic City.

Since the crime was still under 1970 law, Cherry will be eligible for parole in 13 years. Current law would have resulted in either the death penalty or a life sentence with parole eligibility after 13 years.

Cherry contends that the Black Panthers, upset with his resignation from the party, framed him with the murder of Office John P. Burke. A number of ex-party members, including one who was acquitted in 1971 of being Cherry's accomplice, testified during the trial.

The jury found that, Sept. 30, 1970, Burke stopped Cherry and another man outside a bar. Within moments, Cherry placed a sawed-off shotgun to Burke's neck and fired. Days after the killing, Cherry fled to New York City and then to Cuba.

The prosecution stated that Cherry's action was further proof of his guilt, while Cherry testified he was fearful of his wrongful arrest because of the nature of the crime.

In 1970, when the United States was "flecked with tension," to be a black man accused of killing a white police officer was due reason for anxiety, Cherry believed.

Cherry voluntarily returned to the United States Sept. 26, 1990, in belief that this country offered the best hope for black progress.

SIMI VALLEY, Calif.

One of four police officers on trial for the now-famous videotaped beating of Rodney King recently testified he considered using lethal force because he believed King was a potential threat.

Sergeant Stacey Koon stated amidst cross-examination that he pondered shooting King or using a choke-hold on him, while other officers were beating him with their batons.

Koon, the first defendant to take the stand, continually insisted that King must have been under the influence of a hallucenogenic PCP when he was stopped, something medical witnesses have testified he was not.

KOROR, Palau

A high-ranking politician and two others have been arrested and charged with allegedly plotting the assassination of the first president of the republic seven years ago.

Former Minister of State John O. Ngiraked, Sulial Heinrick and Emerita Kerradel were implicated by a man who admitted to murdering President Haruo Remeliik June 30, 1985. All three were recently arrested and charged with first-degree murder.

Ngiraked was Remeliik's political opponent and had called first-degree murder. Ngiraked was Remeliik's political opponent and had called for the president's resignation.

Chance for Cuban democracy under Castro seems slim

By JANET KEMPLE
Staff Reporter

The present and future of Cuba was the topic of a lecture delivered by Dr. Luis Aguilar Leon on March 19 at Tolentine Hall.

Leon is a native of Cuba who has taught both there and in the United States. He is currently a professor of history at Georgetown University and has published several books and articles.

While Cuba has changed over the past 30 years, one constant has been the leadership of Fidel Castro. "He is still there, alone, in power, and he has achieved a lot, but certainly not the positive things that people expected," said Leon.

Not all of the blame for Castro's long reign can be placed on the leader himself, according to Leon. Castro's legendary charisma has managed to sway the people, who have been desperately searching for a sense of pride in their nation.

Castro polarized people against all outsiders, convincing them that they must remain unified against the rest of the world.

By the time Cubans realized that Castro's methods of achieving a powerful Cuba were harsh and repressive, they were too afraid to come forward and denounce him. Today, many Cubans live in fear that they will become the next victims of the regime, he added.

While the future of Cuba is difficult to predict, much depends upon Castro himself, according to Leon. Castro's mentality is close to that of Hitler; he would do anything to save his prestige and will not go down by his own failing.

In the past, Castro has threatened to burn the island rather than return to capitalism.

Under Castro's programs, "the principal rivers of the island are now polluted," creating an "ecological disaster," said Leon. The traditional agricultural economy is failing, due to a decrease in the demand for tobacco and sugar, two principal crops.

Economically, Cuba's proximity to the United States gives its products the best opportunity to be distributed to the world's largest market, Leon said. A turning away from agriculture might even provide the answer. "Sugar cannot be the future ... tourism could be a tremendous restorer," said Leon.

Although much of the world looks to the fall of communism in Cuba and a return to democracy, this would be difficult to accomplish with the people the way they are today. They need to be educated in the ways of democracy and taught how to vote and choose leaders effectively, said Leon.

The people who Castro exiled could "return and build democracy in Cuba," Leon said. Whatever the method, a future transformation to democracy would be a long and difficult process, he said.

"The fight for democracy is like the fight of the alcoholic against drinking. You can never say that it is over ... only that I have survived today," Leon said.

Former USSR focus of lecture

By JIM DOWNS

Tatiana Pavlova presented a lecture about the state of the former Soviet Union and the current development of Russia March 24 in Bartley Hall.

Pavlova, a citizen of Moscow, holds a dual doctorate degree in history with a concentration in 18th century English history.

The main problem in Russia is not lack of food, medicine or education, said Pavlova. A lack of moral substance seems to be the country's main problem, she added.

Pavlova's lecture centered on the Revolution in 1917. The Revolution led to the destruction of the moral fiber of the country, said Pavlova.

In 1917, the implementation of the Marxist Utopia took place. The Marxist form of government was against religion and its primary motive was to build a materialistic society without God, Pavlova said.

The Communists' main intention was to turn stones into bread and take away another kind of bread that deals with the spirit, Pavlova said, adding that the motive of Communism was to create bread for all and inevitably a perfect environment.

During the years of communist control in Russia there were times when bread was a scarce commodity, Pavlova said.

"A system without God does not exist ... We will fall if we do not believe in God," said Pavlova.

The new political structure of the country allows for religion to be practiced in a more tolerant environment, Pavlova said. The largest denomination in Russia is the Russian Orthodox Church. After the Communists took control, religion was suspected of being a servant of the state, she said.

Professor Kerbel analyzes campaign news coverage

By CHRISTINA CLARK
Staff Reporter

Due to the large influence of television on the opinions of millions of voters, Dr. Matthew Kerbel of the political science department has undertaken the task of examining prime-time coverage of the presidential campaign.

Kerbel's analysis, which commenced at the beginning of this year, involves campaign coverage as portrayed through ABC and CNN television networks.

Two major objectives of the research are aimed to explore the similarities and differences between coverage aired by major networks and cable networks, said Kerbel.

Some of Kerbel's findings indicate that both ABC and CNN focus mainly on the presidential candidates in comparison to other factors of importance in the campaign, such as the group supporters of candidates and their purpose in the actual campaign process. These findings also revealed that the general public exceeds the candidates in receiving the greatest amount of attention during campaign coverage, he said.

Even though the public comes in second for prime time coverage, the amount of attention it receives is far less than that of candidates, Kerbel said. In addition, Kerbel observed that, in the initial stages of campaign coverage, ABC focused more on the general public as compared to CNN.

Kerbel also found that three recurring themes dominate media coverage. One theme refers to a candidate's utilization of a particular issue to gain support, he said. Another includes the portrayal of a candidate's image through coverage, said Kerbel. Lastly, the "horse race theme" reveals the amount of public support each candidate possesses.

"Contrary to conventional wisdom, there was a substantial emphasis on the issues early in the campaign, but this emphasis declined precipitously as soon as the 'horse race' intensified following the New Hampshire primary," Kerbel said.

Matthew Kerbel, political science

Kerbel also said that the period between the New Hampshire primary and super Tuesday (March 10) showed heightened coverage of the "horse race" at the expense of issue coverage.

> Contrary to conventional wisdom, there was a substantial emphasis on the issues early in the campaign, but this emphasis declined precipitously as soon as the "horse race" intensified following the New Hampshire primary.
> Matthew Kerbel

Ultimately, Kerbel hopes to speak with production managers at ABC and CNN to discuss why election coverage appears the way it does. From this standpoint, Kerbel said that he will be able to further discern how much of the news which reaches the public is actually derived from the reporter's perspective.

With these findings, Kerbel believes that he will be able to predict how much of the news is derived from fact and the reporter's desire to be as objective as possible, he said.

Ozone depletion increases exposure to UV light

By KATE SZUMANSKI
Assistant News Editor

The Villanova Chapter of Sigma Xi is sponsoring a presentation entitled "Stratospheric Ozone Depletion as it Affects Life on Earth" by Dr. Thomas P. Coohill in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center April 3 at 5 p.m.

"This lecture has been presented to audiences throughout the world, including Korea, China, the Confederation of Independent States, Hungary and India," according to a biography provided by Coohill. The lecture describes the ozone layer, the impact of human activities on the ozone layer and current ozone losses, said Coohill.

Coohill's presentation will discuss the additional ultraviolet radiation penetrating the depleted ozone layer; methods of estimating the impacts of increased ultraviolet radiation on living systems; and the effects of increased ultraviolet radiation on human skin cancer, cataracts, immune responses and on terrestrial plants and aquatic plankton.

Possible solutions to this problem and a prognosis for the future will also be discussed, according to Coohill.

Recent data has suggested that ozone depletion is worse than originally expected, said Dr. Byron Ward, president-elect of Sigma Xi. Coohill's lecture "should raise public understanding of the important scientific issue of stratospheric ozone depletion with its apparent societal hazards."

> The ozone depletion is worse than originally expected.
> Dr. Byron Ward, president-elect of Sigma Xi

Coohill is professor and head of the department of physics and astronomy at Western Kentucky University. He is a leading expert on the effects of ultraviolet radiation on living organisms. His specialty is action spectroscopy and the use of various ultraviolet sources for bio-medical research.

Coohill is concerned with estimating the potential biological consequences of increased ultraviolet radiation responsible for stratospheric ozone depletion.

Coohill has received university awards in both teaching and research and has served as president of the American Society for Photobiology from 1989 to 1990.

"Sigma Xi is an honor society which serves for scientists and engineers much the same function that Phi Beta Kappa does for the humanities. The mission of Sigma Xi is to honor scientific accomplishments, to encourage and to enhance worldwide appreciation and support of original investigation in science and technology and to foster worldwide a creative and dynamic interaction among science, technology and society," said Ward.

roles in my fraternity. I have been Brotherhood Development Chairman. I have one of the major roles in our ritual preparation. I am a Senior Marshall, and outside the fraternity I am Assistant Group Leader in the Small Business Consulting Organization. I am involved in almost every intramural sport and I also played Villanova volleyball for two years. I am a member of the Economics Honor Society and also a member of the Psychology Club."

In your opinion, what is the role of Student Government president? What are the limitations of the office?

Ken Batchelor: "I think the role of Student Body president most importantly is to represent Villanova University. The Student Body president represents the entire student body and he represents them in policy fashion.

"I think a lot of the problems people have with Student Government is understanding the role the Student Government plays here at Villanova University. I think I have gained a great understanding of what that role is. Student Government is a policy-oriented organization here on campus. Through different policies and proposals that it can recommend in the Senate, things can be changed, things can be done, also things can be done through the right contacts through the cabinet.

"I think the one most important thing the Student Body president can do, though, is bring the whole University together; all organizations, like the Intercollegiate Forum [ICF] which Student Government started. I think it really helped define the fact that students are there to bring together these organizations to create some unity within the University."

Scott McBride: "The role of the Student Body president is first to try to implement or integrate the students into student life. I think that should be done through publication since it is the best means to reach people. The Villanovan is a very widely read publication at this school and that is a very good way to reach the students.

"The Student Body president should recognize that they have limitations and they cannot do everything in one year. They should take some good things that we represented in previous years and work to see that they come to fruition. The Student Body president should bring in a couple of new ideas and try to set down a couple to make sure that they are actually implemented and not fishing for things that may be unattainable."

Michael Zubey: "The role of Student Body president involves bringing the Student Government policies to the students, which is the most important role the Student Body president has. Because this leadership position entails the representation of the entire student body, the Student Government nor the Student Body president should be making decisions for the student body without the student input. I believe this is one of the major problems now. The student body is not involved enough and they should be taken out of this apathetic state.

"I do believe that with hard work and diligence almost anything can be accomplished. I think that has been shown with Mark O'Rourke. He has gotten a lot of difficult issues tackled and initiated. I believe that with my enthusiasm and commitment to bettering this University and the policies for the students, I do not see many obstacles other than financial constraints on the administration's part."

What are the most important issues concerning Villanova?

Ken Batchelor: "I think there are a lot of issues facing Villanova. One of the many issues facing Villanova is the housing issue which Father Dobbin has told us is being taken care of in 1994. The Student Government has worked with Kevin O'Donnell, RSA and VEG to make some great advances in the area of recycling, which is another important issue. Recycling in this semester alone has doubled last year's total.

"The whole idea of diversity on campus has become such a buzzword on campus. I think that the Campaign for Community is a very hot topic and I am disappointed that it became such a hot issue in these debates when the Campaign for Community has been trying to do things all year. But then everyone talks about it when it comes to election time. I think the basketball tickets, the core curriculum, endowment, the Strategic Plan and handicapped accessibility are just a few of the things that face Student Government."

Scott McBride: "I think one of the major issues is campus housing which will be addressed by the west campus construction. Another issue is student study hours in dorms. I feel there are areas on campus that should be utilized."

Michael Zubey: "Currently, the most important issue is the problem of diversity. I believe there is a lot of diversity at this University but a lot of people simply become complacent about the issue and don't take the time to learn about other cultures. The promotion of an understanding of different races, religions, and cultures is important to Villanova."

versity needs to improve parking, athletic facilities and housing, he said.

When asked by Tom Collins, editor-in-chief of the Villanovan, how parking would be affected by down-sizing, Donovan said, "The University must look at parking from the students' perspective . . . and not start ticketing cars at 2 a.m. when students need to be on-campus to study."

Melissa Grimm, a junior international business major running for re-election, said she is working for full implementation of the Career Planning and Placement Center and "trying to find a way to get credit for Commerce and Finance students who travel abroad."

The six students competing for the Arts and Sciences positions said they want to work on improving the quality of life for students.

To do this, Nicholas Aversa, a junior political science major, said he would locate a bar and nightclub on campus for student use and would try to extend visitation hours in the residence halls.

Aversa said he would stress "more open forums and then increased action" when asked by Michael Knab, editor-in-chief of Polis, what he would do to promote diversity next year for the 150th anniversary of the University.

Kathy Breen, who is running for re-election, said she was concerned that the University's right-sizing would cut down on the quality of the school. "Advertisement in the Arts [and Sciences] school is lacking and desperately needing some attention."

The telecommunication system also is lacking, according to Breen, a junior political science major. Phones in the residence halls and emergency phones are necessary, she added.

Junior history major Sean Ferrier said the University needs to "revamp student advisement for undecided Arts [and Sciences] majors."

The University should support the fine arts with more funding, Ferrier said. As senator he would work for student input into west campus development, he added.

Knab asked Ferrier what attitude the 150th anniversary of the University should raise within the student body. The students should feel "a sense of togetherness" and know that "the Catholic tradition can be used to build on the idea of a university for knowledge," said Ferrier.

John Fowler, junior political science major, said he stressed campus diversity, student say in University spending, more housing for students and computer links in the library.

Students show a lack of concern for issues that concern them, Fowler said. Lowering the $130 price for basketball tickets would have been addressed sooner if students had expressed interest in the issue, he added.

McGee asked Fowler what are the positive or negative contributions of fraternities and sororities. Fowler said alcohol abuse and freshmen joining just to drink were drawbacks. As a positive aspect, the Greek system provides a place for people to unite, making it easier for them to adjust to college life, said Fowler.

Matt Haggerty, a junior political science major, said he supported a pedestrian tunnel under Lancaster Avenue and west campus expansion. As senator, he also said he would work with the administration on lowering basketball ticket prices.

Stephen LaRose, president of the Interfraternity Council (IFC), asked Haggerty how he would improve student relationships with the community. "The students have an obligation to treat neighbors with respect" by not making noise and littering, said Haggerty.

Rosanna Picillo, sophomore economics major, said the new core curriculum for the College of Arts and Sciences deals with writing skills. "Every school should have a class where students learn to write correctly," she said.

Picillo also focused on increasing computer labs on campus, lengthening visitation hours and modernizing the residence halls.

Running for engineering senator, Stanley Reggie said the issues he would address include expanding the hours of computer and study facilities to alleviate overcrowding.

Reggie, a junior chemical engineering major, proposed a main line shuttle bus to transport students to campus.

Kelly Ann Walsh, senatorial candidate for the College of Nursing, said she would work in the interest of education, spiritual growth and social concerns of the students.

"The nursing senator should act as an effective liaison, promoting positive, open and responsive communication," said Walsh, a sophomore nursing major.

Walsh said that she would use correspondents and the St. Mary's mailboxes when asked by Nancy Burns of Student Nurses Association of Pennsylvania (SNAP), what she would do to learn of the concerns of the Nursing students. Lynne Curry, said she supports efforts to increase University housing by decreasing the numbers of newly admitted students and promoting housing construction.

Curry said as senator she would encourage the University to have Martin Luther King Jr. Day as a holiday from classes so students could attend the events held around campus.

Knab asked Curry how she would work to preserve the character of the community. "Villanova University was founded as a Catholic university with the ideals of a Catholic education," said Curry, adding that "open forums at the University preserve open acceptance and learning of other people's views."

Students may vote April 1 at tables located outside Connelly Center from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., at all dining halls from 4:30 to 7:30 p.m. and in Bartley Cafe from 6 to 9 p.m.

between students and the administration was the most important issue at the University. The "facilitation of communication of the student body" could help lessen this communication gap, he added.

Collins asked McBride what role, if any, Student Government could play in increasing endowment. McBride, a former member of the External Affairs Committee, said that endowment was "much more of an administrative goal.

"The Student Government can work with the administration in any way deemed possible by them," McBride added.

Damas asked Batchelor how he perceived race relations on campus and how they could be improved. People do not feel comfortable communicating, said Batchelor. He added that events like Diversity Day, which he helped organize, can help students open their minds to other cultures.

"Understanding is the key to solve racism," said Batchelor.

Also, McGovern asked Batchelor if he would support gay-lesbian and abortion groups that wanted to form on campus. "I would in no way favor hampering anyone's rights," Batchelor said.

Meehan asked Zubey why she should vote for him.

"For the same reason people voted for Mark O'Rourke," said Zubey, who, like O'Rourke, possesses no experience in Student Government.

Roberts asked McBride if the new core curriculum in the College of Arts and Sciences went too far or not far enough. The changes made in the core curriculum are good but "it is essential to keep religion and philosophy because we are a Catholic college," said McBride.

McBride was also asked by Brandon if he would support a condom distribution if the students were in favor of it. McBride said that he would not support such a proposal because this is a Catholic university and Catholic doctrine opposes any form of birth control.

Brandon followed-up the question by citing that students do not have to be Catholic to attend the University, so why should the students have to be governed by Catholic doctrine.

"There is only one Catholic doctrine," McBride said.

Roberts asked Zubey if he would support campus censorship of such things as pro-choice posters.

"Everyone has their own free choice and right to believe what they want to believe," said Zubey.

Damas asked Zubey how he planned to represent the ideas of minorities on campus. "Through the Intercollegiate Forum . . . [we can] come to a consensus and affect a change," McBride said.

McGovern asked Zubey how he would improve the intellectual environment on campus. The intellectual environment at the University is "closed and one-sided" and this could be improved through increased communication between students, faculty and administration, Zubey said.

Collins asked McBride what could be done to alleviate gender problems on campus, such as females often feeling inferior to males in the classroom.

"The cause of gender problems . . . is almost ingrained socially," said McBride. It is important to make sure that both sexes are represented fairly in Student Government, he added.

Brandon asked Batchelor what could be done to deal with the problem of date rape. Batchelor, who helped plan a date rape seminar last semester, said that seminars, lectures and talks are important ways to educate students about date rape and hopefully help keep students safe.

Damas asked Zubey how he would increase student recruitment.

"My proposal is to get students involved," said Zubey. He added that he would like to see students go back to their high schools to recruit, a program already implemented by the Blue Key Society.

Gironta asked McBride what would be done to replace the athletic facilities that were leveled off in order to build the new Liberal Arts building. The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, already had plans to replace these fields when west campus was developed, McBride said.

"It is the Student Government's job to make sure that the administration does what they are supposed to do," he added.

stood right in front of me and the other three were behind me. The guy in front asked me the time and without taking my hand out of my pocket I said it was about 11 p.m.

"He kept bothering me about the time and the watch. But I thought he was joking since the other three were laughing. I said, 'You really don't want the watch' . . . Then I got hit on the ear by one of them. Public Safety did a great job. They caught the guy within 15 minutes."

Christina Macauley, a sophomore Arts and Sciences major, was walking towards the "Oreo" and saw the four men leaving, and Stinson lying on the ground. Stinson said to her that he had just been mugged. Macauley then assisted Stinson into Connelly Center, where he notified Public Safety of the incident.

The assault report was dispatched to Public Safety officers. Officer Rudolf Armogan responded to the call, sighting four men walking west along Lancaster Avenue and broadcast it to the Public Safety office. The description matched that of four males that Sgt. Augosto Mastrola stopped along Lancaster Avenue minutes later.

The four suspects were held in custody until Stinson was brought to the scene. He identified the four males as those who had assaulted and robbed him. The watch was found approximately 10 feet away from where the suspects were stopped, according to a Public Safety report.

After Public Safety notified Radnor Police, Howe and Sgt. Thomas Flannery arrived on the scene. Howe took the suspects to Radnor Police Station. Flannery transported Stinson to Bryn Mawr Hospital for medical attention, according to a police report.

Stinson suffered no injuries, said Mann.

"We don't know what those four guys were doing on campus in the first place," Mann said. "It is something we're looking into."

Batchelor earns our vote

The Villanovan endorses Ken Batchelor for Student Government president. As we enter a pivotal year celebrating the 150th anniversary of the University, we believe Batchelor earns our endorsement. He is the candidate to lead us into the future.

The candidates for president, Scott McBride, Michael Zubey and Batchelor, presented themselves strongly at the presidential debate March 24, and each articulated a thoughtful platform. With the newly launched Capital Campaign, downsizing and the Sesquicentennial celebration so important to our future, the candidates were well-researched and prepared for the debate. We chose Batchelor over McBride and Zubey not because they offered weak positions, but because Batchelor is the most balanced candidate.

McBride possesses the necessary experience and dedication for the position of president. He has served in Student Government since his freshman year, and his experience includes work on the Core Curriculum Committee and the External Affairs Commitee. McBride also took the initiative to begin the Student Alumni Association. However, his rhetoric lacked authority. And, while he proved himself as a worker, the charisma necessary for strong leadership was missing.

In addition, he placed too much emphasis on administrative, not student, concerns.

Zubey also presented himself well in the debate. We were pleasantly surprised by his knowledge of current Student Government issues despite his inexperience. He showed potential as a leader and his ideas stressed creativity.

Yet, Zubey has no previous Student Government experience, and his lack of involvement showed at critical points, especially when he addressed an issue resolved by current President Mark O'Rourke's administration — campus credit cards for next semester. Also, his platform contains two other policies currently in action. He proposed a student-run recruiting campaign and computerized registration. The University has a high school recruiting student organization, The Blue Key Society, and computereized registration is presently being instituted. Although he campaigns as an "outsider with fresh ideas," we believe his inexperience is a liability. Considering Student Government's positive momentum, a major transition and turnover could hinder efforts given the magnitude of the Sesquicentennial.

We endorse Batchelor because he displayed charisma, leadership and experience at the debate and in his involvement with Student Government for three years. Currently an Arts Senator, he has the edge over McBride because of his inside knowledge of the Senate. He also transcends McBride's comparable involvement with his leadership skills. Batchelor's understanding of Student Government and campus issues display more depth than Zubey's perception. His vice-president, Kathy Breen, also an Arts Senator, brings similar skills.

Batchelor's strongest proposals include a transportation shuttle along the Main Line during weekends and a 24-hour visitation policy. He has received positive feedback on the shuttle program from Student Life, and his visitation agenda appear solid despite obvious conflicts with administration. A check-in Public Safety officer at all dorms will provide the students with the 24-hour visitation policy they want while maintaining campus security.

Batchelor appeared too polished at times. At moments, he presented his message too quickly. However, because of his past record and future vision, he earns our vote in a pivotal year.

In the senatorial elections, we endorse Breen, Sean Ferrier and John Fowler for the three vacant Arts Senator positions. For the three Commerce and Finance vacancies, we select Melissa Grimm, Sebastian Carrado and Daniel Donovan. The other positions in Engineering, Science and Nursing, are uncontested.

Articles provoke responses

To the Editor:

The Old Testament book of Deuteronomy has Moses bluntly tell his people: "Choose life that you may live" (30:20). Ancient civilizations were already aware that if you want to capture a people's mind, capture its language and you will be well on its way to success (Confucius, Socrates).

The unrelenting attempts by extreme "rights"-minded forces in this nation to capture the language and thereby remold thinking to its flawed logic is — consciously or unconsciously — displayed by Monica McDermott and Michelle Rossi, in their position: "'Pro-choice speaks." (March 20 issue)

The commentary reads: "Supporting reproductive freedom is not synonymous with being pro-abortion."

No, it just includes it as one of a smorgasbord of hedonistic delectables. The refusal to square with the connotations of language in this and related articles propagandizing the so-called "right to choose" could provide much fun for the logician, philosopher and sociology instructor, here and elsewhere, were it not so tragic that many people are duped with such sophistry.

Any child who is just old enough to know the facts of life, realizes that reproductive freedom ceases when the definition of same is fulfilled: at intercourse. From then on, the decision to reproduce is a fait accompli and honesty demands that freedom to kill the unborn must be identified in clear terms. Why is this not done clearly, say, as in the case of Deuteronomy's mandate?

At least two diversionary detours from truthseeking seem to be at the root of it: (1) don't foist your religious antiques on my liberated thinking (though such "liberated thinking" shackles "politically incorrect" dissenters); or (2) capturing the language is the way to capture the people's mind.

So they invent "choice," because it doesn't upset stomachs as much as the real thing — abortion. The goddess Choice is supposed to supercede the Constitution, morality, and earlier human strides recognizing rights of all to life. Change the language, and when that tact doesn't go over, then revert to the tired squawk of the "back-alley, throwing oneself down a flight of stairs, wire hangers and warm gin" [sic] which stirs the emotions rather than admitting the gruesome facts compounding our national fetuscide epidemic with the widespread victimization of women whose plight of poverty abortion is strangely supposed to alleviate.

Congratulations, on the other column, to Kristen Haaf, for not being trapped by emotional hype, language contortions and current Choicespeak. Her logic and fact-finding stands on its own whether stated by a moribund male prelate or Ms. Bizazz. History has a long track record of vindicating Deuteronomy's caveat to choose life. Our civilization need not wind up on the junkpile as well.

To the Editor:

I was very pleased to see that the Villanovan offered a forum for the debate concerning reproductive freedom. As a pro-choice sympathizer, not an abortion advocate as Kristen Haaf suggests, I was glad to see the issue addressed as a way to increase awareness and understanding concerning the issue.

Despite the University's official Catholic stance on abortion, I know that many Villanova students consider themselves pro-choice and it is important that these dissenting voices be heard.

With an issue such as abortion where there is not likely to be opportunity for resolution, I believe that the best we can hope for at our Catholic university is an atmosphere that fosters meaningful discussion and mutual respect for either side.

Unfortunately, Haaf does not appear to respect or, for that matter, understand what it means to be pro-choice. I plan to join the "March for Women's Lives," April 5, not to "advocate abortion," but to defend women's right to reproductive freedom.

Haaf misunderstands or misrepresents what pro-choice supporters are marching for. Saying that we are marching merely for "convenient" abortions (if there is such a thing) or sex selection abortions is like saying that the "pro-life" agenda is for all women with unwanted pregnancies to die in back-alley abortions. And that will indeed become a reality if Roe vs. Wade is overturned.

Haaf has a right to voice her opinion about abortion, but she also has the responsibility to accurately represent the opposing viewpoint.

COMMENTARY

Who do you vote for? Here is one opinion

By WALTER D. GLEASON

The following is my opinion on the candidates for Student Government elections to be held April 1.

Astericks (*) indicate # of issues which positively affect the student body that are espoused by the candidate.

A (+), (-) or (0) sign indicates the overall presentation of the candidate at the March 22-23 debates. 'Yes' or 'No' indicates whether or not the candidate possesses previous Student Government experience.

Arts Senators:

1. Nicholas Aversa — platform contains provisions for an on-campus nightclub/bar, improved computer center in the new Liberal Arts building and extended visitation hours. Aversa indicates good relations within Radnor Township while possessing a creative approach to student apathy.
(:+: No previous experience)

2. Kathy Breen — platform focuses on the important facets of "rightsizing," improved arts advisement, and improved telecommunications. Breen also has come to know the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, University president, well. She possesses the experience and desire to lead the Arts Senators for another year.
(*:-: experienced)

3. Sean Ferrier — believes that student advisement and fine arts awareness must be improved. He also emphasizes the importance of re-allocation of West Campus lands for upperclass, on-campus housing. He faces identity problems because of lack of voter recognition through advertising.
(:-: experienced)

4. John Fowler — views several issues as important. These issues include continued Fall Break, lower basketball ticket prices, better student advisement, greater campus diversity, more West Campus housing and computer links through all dorm telecommunications. Fowler is a virulent apathy-basher.
(*:+: no previous experience)

5. Matthew Haggerty — proposes a pedestrian tunnel under Lancaster Avenue, lower basketball ticket prices, questions faculty spending policies and the advantages of rightsizing. Experience being key, Haggerty is a strong candidate.
(:-: experienced)

6. Rosanna Picillo — favors extension of visitation, West Campus development, and the new Core Curriculum. Picillo has a strong Greek support system and background and possesses ties with Rev. Kail Ellis. An apparent positive influence, Picillo may have damaged this image with a small slur against her competitors during the debate.
(*:-: No previous experience)

Commerce and Finance Senators:

1. Matthew Brach — platform encompasses more campus unity and an all-student basketball game (i.e. students in the alumni seats). He has a heart the size of Texas, but creativity and experience are questionable.
(:-: No previous experience)

2. Sebastian Carrado — platform includes less steering in business students first-year curriculum and updating the Bartley computer center. Carrado wishes to exclusively dedicate his energies to the Commerce and Finance community. He cannot rest on his laurels if he wishes to win a Senatorial position.
(:-: No previous experience)

3. Daniel Donovan — focuses on many issues including the improvement of the Bartley computer lab and business library, more available parking, housing and athletic facilities and a greater national appeal as well as more student involvement on campus. Conscientious and diligent, Donovan needs to bolster his public image to guarantee victory.
(:0: no previous experience)

4. Melissa Grimm — platform includes improvements in Career Planning and Placement, extended hours for Bartley library, credit given for all business related internships and better international business programs. Grimm serves currently as a Senator and indicates familiarity with the operations of the Villanova administration.
(:-: experienced)

Uncontested Senators:

1. Lynne Curry (Science) — demonstrates a great interest in improving on-campus housing while eliminating student apathy. She also feels that a re-evaluation of Mendel Hall's work-space, more lectures for diversity awareness, and declaration of Martin Luther King's birthday as a University holiday.
(:0: No previous experience)

2. Stanley Reggie (Engineering) — believes the following issues are essential to the Villanova community: student diversity, curriculum revisions, greater work-space, extended study hours and available parking, housing and athletic facilities.
(:0: No previous experience)

3. Kelly Ann Walsh (Nursing) — favors more open communication and a strong representative voice in Senate for the school of Nursing. Although running unopposed, Walsh needs to speak more publicly to the desires of her Nursing constituents.
(:0: No previous experience)

Presidential Candidates:

1. Ken Batchelor — platform includes nearly every issue imaginable, but neglects to mention down-sizing. Strong points include night transportation, diversity awareness and campus date rape counteraction. Charismatic, experienced and open-minded, Batchelor needs only maintain his current practices to have a very good chance at the student body presidency.
(*:0: experienced)

2. Scott McBride — platform focuses on convenient coed study hours (as opposed to extended visitation), computerized registration, individual advisement and computer labs in the new Liberal Arts building. Desires better communication with the administration. Strong points include new core curriculum and increased endowment. Is often conservative and has stated that he will go against student sentiment on controversial issues if they were to rise.
(:0: experienced)

3. Michael Zubey — believes that fresh blood is intertwined with new ideas and cites the success of current President Mark O'Rourke as an example. He is an apathy-basher who possesses many ideas to create more student involvement. Other issues he supports include better telecommunications, the AIDS task force and more diverse recruitment. Zubey has tremendous personal appeal and heart. However, his lack of experience and desire to work in O'Rourke's shadow, not beyond it, are his most serious liabilities.
(*:+: No previous experience)

It is important to note that these views do not necessarily reflect those held by any other student organization, including the Villanovan, at the University. The above interpretation was taken from the opening statements, responses and closing statements made by the candidates during their respective debates March 23 (Senate) and March 24 (President). If you have any questions, comments, or suggestions, please send them to Box 1918, Kennedy Hall. Most of all, please do not forget to use your right to vote this April 1. If you do not, you will be left out of the sweeping changes our University faces.

Walter David Gleason is a freshman history major who plans to teach African-American history at the college level someday. Change is his favorite concept, and he hopes his next four years at Villanova will be filled with it.

I realize I am not as environmentally aware as I should be. I have worked on recycling and adjusting my eating habits in relation to the causes of preserving our environment. As I have been learning more through lectures and groups such as VEG, I have been trying to apply it to my lifestyle. I hope to be involved with some of the activities on Earth Day.

Members of community debate campus issues

To the Editor:

I am writing regarding the posting of two types of flyers on the walls in many of the campus buildings and in Vasey Hall where I work as a part-time secretary. The flyers are adamantly advocating a position on abortion which is in total opposition to the teachings of the Catholic Church. Nevertheless, these flyers have received official stamps of approval from the activities office to be posted on the University walls.

It seems to me that this state of affairs also puts us as a Catholic institution in opposition to our own goals as stated in Villanova's own Mission Statement. To quote from the Mission Statement, paragraph 2, "Although Villanova functions as an independent institution in the conduct of its own affairs, in matters theological it recognizes its obligation to the Magisterium of the Church."

Being open to people of all religious persuasions in our admission policies and in the way in which we conduct ourselves with respect to the beliefs of others certainly seems a far cry from actually assisting them to achieve goals which are in total opposition to our own beliefs, especially when those goals involve something as basic as the so-called "right" to kill an unborn human child in the womb.

We are literally assisting those who would like to bury the Catholic Church and destroy its influence over the lives of its own people. Jesus himself predicted these events on his walk to Calvary when he admonished the women to weep for themselves and for their children and that one day they would ask the mountains to fall on them and the hills to cover them.

We are allowing the pagan world to destroy us in our own institutions, giving them our blessings as they do so.

Edith F. Iannucci

To the Editor:

I read Peter Molineaux's article (March 13 issue) with some interest but must confess that his writing is certainly neither scientific nor factual in reply to that of Morton A. Klein.

As a matter of fact, it is replete with opinions and unanswered questions or issues. It is a study in contrast. He first calls Klein indirectly hypocritical and ends in calling him a demagogue and an extremist; certainly not the manifestation of an open mind or respect for another view.

Molineaux shows his lack of knowledge regarding even Judea/Samaria, commonly called the West Bank, which is not regarded by Israel as occupied territory, but administered territory. Frankly, Israel does not want the territory which contains over one million Arabs.

Molineaux uses the phrase 'most legal scholars,' without citing any names. He alleges that Israel is the most destabilizing force, but cites no facts and engages in fiction and hyperbole. He refers to Israel's invasion in 1982 of Lebanon, but fails to tell the readers that Syria invaded Lebanon in 1975 and now occupies the entire country and that the Syrians killed thousands of people not to mention about 15,000 Syrian citizens in the city of Hama.

Contrary to his assertion, the Arabs in these tiny territories referred to were offered autonomy by the Camp David Accords and I quote: Section A, paragraph 1: "Egypt, Israel, Jordan and the representatives of the Palestinian people shall participate in negotiations on the resolution of the Palestinian problem in all its aspects."

Paragraph A-2 calls for transitional arrangements for the territories for a period not exceeding five years and after elections, the military will withdraw upon a self-governing authority being in place." With regard to the loan guarantees, this would cost the U.S. nothing. It simply frees up loans to Israel at a better rate and Israel has never defaulted on any loans.

Furthermore, it would create jobs in the U.S., helping our poor economy as it is. Israel has already helped create a boom in prefabricated homes here in the U.S.; homes for those fleeing persecution.

Finally, Molineaux's attack on Klein is unwarranted and an example of sophistry and casuistry. Klein on the other hand simply wanted to correct errors with facts and he did not attack Molineaux in the manner that Molineaux did.

Jay Meyers

To the Editor:

As a casual observer, I am puzzled, editorially speaking, as I read conflicting reports in the Feb. 21 issue of your esteemed student newspaper.

Elizabeth Barszczewski quotes Gary Bonas, the associate director of Student Activities, as follows: " ... students refuse to go to alcohol-free activities."

Then, in the same issue, Jennifer Castelli and Larisa Epatko published a front page, first column piece: "Student Attitudes Polled," in which we find: " ... 92 percent of respondents would attend a social function that did not serve alcohol."

Was there a misquote in one of these?

Do or do not college students know how to have harmless fun without risking, lasting undesirable consequences?

It is obvious that date rape and crippling, if not fatal, car accidents are usually alcohol or drug related; ask any hospital emergency staff member, or any police officer, or any undertaker, or counselor in a crisis pregnancy center.

And, it does not have to be that way.

Can it be that your "music" is so amplified that no verbal communication is possible? Are there no longer non-alcoholic, drug-free coffeehouses where young people can gather for harmless fun and games? It should not cost you your hearing to join your friends in a non-academic ambiance for some necessary relaxation.

If young men and women do not learn to communicate in their student years, how will they ever understand the opposite sex if and when they marry? Does anyone else recognize loud music as a barrier to communication?

Colleges would help improve the futures of their alumni and alumnae by fostering healthy, wholesome activities that provide sincere opportunities for lasting friendships where intelligent communication happens without sex, drugs or alcohol. It can be done.

Opinions differ on Freind

To the Editor:

I would like to thank Candice Polsky for her response to Mark O'Rourke's letter of two weeks ago. I can reiterate the facts that she laid out but I will not. O'Rourke's letter sets an even more dangerous precedent. It seems that he would like us to vote with "Wildcat Pride" instead of our own minds.

If there is one thing worse than an apathetic voter, it is the type of voter that O'Rourke blueprints. These are the voters that generally feel no effect of politics on their everyday life and are persuaded into voting on the cosmetics of the candidate rather than the real issues that the candidate espouses. Perhaps every Yale graduate should vote for President Bush, or every Georgetown graduate for Patrick Buchanan. I myself went to the same high school as Steve Freind and graduated with his son Steve. In O'Rourke's philosophy of voting, I should probably be working for his campaign.

I believe that Villanova should be teaching us to think logically and as individuals. This is what I have garnered from my four years at this institution, and I hope that it is what everyone else is striving to achieve. Voting can often times generate a herd mentality around candidates that run superficial campaigns.

I believe that we as Villanovans have to set ourselves apart from the herd. One must dig deep into the campaigns and find the candidate that most expresses the values to which they themselves are amenable. "Wildcat Pride" is great at basketball games, but in the game of politics it has no place. In this year of the sesquicentennial, Villanova would be much better served by its graduates and undergraduates using their intelligence and their education.

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to Ms. Candice Polsky's article in which she writes half-truths regarding Steve Freind. First, I would like to ask Ms. Polsky if she is related to Allen Polsky? Allen Polsky lost twice to Steve Freind in the race for State Representative. Second, Ms. Polsky's claims that Steve Freind violated ethics regarding office space is false. Many politicians in this state have their respective businesses located in the same area as their legislative offices. This saves the taxpayers money because the respective business pays the majority of the rent. Furthermore, the house ethics committee has not pursued this question any further because they know that Steve was not in violation.

In response to the "rape" comment, Steve Freind was given false medical information and publicly apologized when this was brought to his attention. His opponent, Arlen Spector, has yet to apologize for his comments regarding Saddam Hussein. To explain, one week before the Persian Gulf War Arlen Spector stated on the Senate floor that Sadam Hussein was a decent and rational leader. It takes a courageous politician to admit a mistake, and Steve Freind is one of the few politicians that will admit that he is a human being. Arlen Spector has yet to admit his mistake that cost American lives.

Student says, "Apathy saved me from the cult"

By PETER SHAUGER

You heard a lot last semester about cult activity on the Villanova campus. Cult recruiters use highly persuasive techniques such as, crazy as it sounds, being friendly and appearing to show genuine concern for things you have to say (sort of like a girlfriend or a high school guidance counselor).

I should know, since they were after me this past fall.

Immediately, I was wary of the young cult guy who first approached me. He was like my girlfriend and my guidance counselor rolled into one annoying hot-air balloon.

First, the cult guy just happened to have similar interests as myself, such as music, Fig Newtons and the opposite sex. Then, the cult guy tried to relate to me by mentioning those things in a casual conversation like, "Hey, how about that intriguing young lad in that Chris Isaak video ... I hear she enjoys Fig Newtons just as you and I do!" But then the cult guy engaged me in the strongest, subtlest, most devious recruiting device ever invented, a mentally and physically grueling game of ping-pong.

> Immediately, I was wary of the young cult guy who first approached me. He was like my girlfriend and my guidance counselor rolled into one annoying hot-air balloon.

Stop the suspense, you say? Do not leave us hanging, you say? Fear not spirited readers. I did not succumb to his sinister temptations, tempting as they were.

But inquisitive minds will ask, "What saved you from the cult's clutches?" No, no, it was not my tremendous biceps, tremendous as they are. The real reason is that I out-foxed them with laziness.

Whether I was interested or not in what they were trying to sell me is beside the point. I might have gone to at least one meeting to see what all the fuss was about, had I not had something better to do that evening. The night the cult guy asked me to go was on a Tuesday, the same night that the multicultural TV show "Coach" airs. If memory serves, it was an especially funny episode.

I mean, how do they expect me to attend one of their gatherings when I hardly have enough energy to clip my own toenails (don't worry, they grow slowly).

But the thing that really perplexes me is why the cult targeted the Villanova campus. Aren't Villanovans so well known for their brotherly and sisterly love that no one would consider entering the gates and actually expecting to find students unhappy with the Greek syndrome. Pardon me, I mean the Greek system.

Unfortunately for the cult, though, they failed to take into account the single most driving force on campus — apathy.

Yes, it is a beautiful thing, apathy. I have such fond childhood memories of apathy coming to my rescue like an invisible knight in shining armor, only he was wearing plaid pants and driving a golf cart.

Like the time when I was at the dinner table and my mom said, "Petey, eat your beans, please." I said, "Okay Mom, I'll get right on it!" And sure enough, two hours later, Mom, realizing that I could outlast any weak and puny little vegetable, cleared them away.

And I remember all the times back in high school when the other kids would be studying and worrying about grades. Not me. I had more important things to worry about, like: will my alarm be loud enough to wake me up early for "Speed Racer," and who was better looking, Speed Racer's girlfriend, Trixie, or his mother.

I am much more relaxed here at Villanova than I would be at a school where they make you do work. Here I feel at home with my unmotivated classmates singing the theme from Annie in three-part harmony.

So some words to the wise: any organization that does not appear extremely eye-catching and sugar-coated — well, I don't really feel like writing any more so I'll quit here. If this article hits close to home for anybody out there, I don't expect to be hearing from you. And for those of you who think apathy is dead, I tell you "no." It is just resting.

Amelia Earhart flew in the face of convention

By ELLEN GOODMAN

The detectives have come back with their evidence. One rubber heel for a woman's size-9 shoe. A threaded top from a bottle that once held stomach medicine. A piece of aluminum skin from the fuselage of a pre-World War II plane.

These artifacts are now offered up as proof that Amelia Earhart died on an inhospitable atoll in the South Pacific. The 39-year-old pilot and her navigator attempting to add yet another first to her list — The First Pilot to Circle the Globe near the Equator — missed Howland Island. Out of fuel, they had landed at Nikumaroro. Out of water, they died there.

"For 55 years, her fate has been a mystery," said Richard Gillespie presenting his flotsam and jetsam of evidence. "Today that mystery is solved."

Well, maybe. The Fate of Amelia Earhart has produced a cottage industry of speculators and mystery lovers. In the early years, there were rumors that Earhart had been taken prisoner by the Japanese, rumors she had disappeared to assume another life. A few even believed she was Tokyo Rose.

Today's Amelia Earhart buffs are a more scientific bunch. But they remain skeptical and are likely to keep the case open. So be it.

Frankly, I find the mystery of Amelia Earhart's death less intriguing than the mystery of her life. If this woman has reminded in the limelight long enough to please even her ardent publicist and husband, George Putnam, it's not because of her disappearing role, it's because of her historic role.

She is still one of that string of "first women" who stretch back through time. It links the first woman pilot to the first woman astronaut, to the first woman fighter pilot. For some the title is a breakthrough and for others a burden, but each changes the world a bit.

Amelia Earhart, "girl pilot," "aviatrix," was born in 1897 in Kansas and never saw a plane until she was 10. She didn't start flying until she was 23. In 1927, at the tail end of one women's movement and long before another, she was a 30-year-old Boston social worker with a pilot's license, scrimping her way out of debt.

Out of the blue, Earhart was asked if she wanted to fly across the Atlantic. In the 1920s, flying was still something between a feat and a stunt, between pathbreaking and barnstorming. After Charles Lindbergh crossed the Atlantic and became an American hero, some people seeking attention for another flight, came upon the idea of the "girl pilot."

So, ironically, in an era when her chances were severely limited by being a woman, Earhart got this chance because she was a woman. When she leaped into fame as the first woman to fly the Atlantic, she was a passenger.

This tall, curly-haired, flight-jacketed woman who might have passed for Lindbergh's sister, quickly came into her own, breaking records and preconceptions, showing her strength.

Earhart's personal life was also marked by independence. On the eve of her marriage to Putnam, who both promoted and pressured her, she wrote "Dear George ... I may have to keep some place where I can go to be by myself now and then, for I cannot guarantee to endure at all times the confinement of even an attractive cage."

The place Earhart went to most often was the sky. In some ways, her career became Being Amelia Earhart. Flying and speaking about flying, flying and writing about it. She made her living from her life, her fame fed by the string of firsts that must have become harder and harder to achieve.

Before she set off for the final trip around the world, weary, underprepared, with a hard-drinking navigator, she told friends that she had just one last big trip in her. She never finished it.

Had she made it home, Earhart might eventually have ended up like the pilot Beryl Markham, living in a bungalow on the edge of a Nairobi race track. Or she may have become an honored foremother at the front of some latter-day parade. Instead she became the heroine, perhaps a touch too romantic, but properly courageous, of any girl who wanted to fly in the face of convention.

"Women must try to do things as men have tried," she wrote in 1935. "When they fail, their failure must be but a challenge to others."

So let the aviation buffs set off again in search of bones and the serial number on a plane. In the end, the mystery of the spirit, the secret of daring and the puzzle of courage are more intriguing and much harder questions to answer than the whereabouts of a long-lost plane.

STUDENT GOVERNMENT ELECTIONS

Presidential Candidates

Ken Batchelor

My name is Ken Batchelor and I am running for the position of Student Body President. Since my freshman year at Villanova I have been actively involved in Student Government. It has always been my belief that students should have the ability to voice their concerns and shape University policy. For that reason, I became a senate assistant my freshman year and a cabinet member my sophomore year. This year I was fortunate to serve on the University Senate, representing the school of liberal arts.

My running mate, Kathy Breen, is also a Senator this year. Together we bring much experience to student government. She is running with me for vice-president, and for re-election to the Senate representing the school of liberal arts. It is necessary for a vice-president to run for senate, for without the senate seat the vice-president has no vote in senate.

Aside from our understanding of student government, we are in-touch with the needs of the students through our involvement in such activities as the Blue Key Society, the Greek system, Campaign for Community, New Student Orientation and the Big Brothers/Big Sisters program.

Our signs posted around campus say, "VOTE EXPERIENCE." We say this because we have not merely been talking about the issues, instead we have been making them and acting on them in student government.

We have:

— made tuition proposals along with financial aid recommendations to the senate budget committee, represented Villanova at the National Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities, served on many senate committees, worked on Senior Saturday, helped achieve extension of Bartley study hours, currently addressing issues of improved telecommunications (phones in those dorm rooms that still need them) and price of basketball tickets in the University Senate.

We want to continue many of these projects along with developing a night transportation system, create 24-hour study lounges, improve advisement program, re-evaluate visitation policy and most importantly, bring Student Government to the Students. We want to let the students know what is going on in Student Government and get them involved. We can do this now with our experience.

Vote Ken Batchelor and Kathy Breen on April 1.

Scott McBride

My name is Scott McBride. I am a junior with a double major in political science and history. I became involved with Student Govenment at Villanova in the first month of my freshman year. That year, I was a member of the External Affairs Committee, whose role was to try to improve the relations between the University and the local residents.

In my sopohomore year, I became a cabinet member in Kerry Stromberg's administration. I was given the new position of Alumni Representative. The goal behind this new position was to increase interaction between the Student Government Office and the Alumni Office and its director, Robert J. Capone. Through this position, I founded and am the president of the Student Alumni Association (SAA). This organization seeks to create communiation and interaction between the students of Villanova University and its alumni. The SAA recently sponsored Network Nights and co-sponsored last semester's Senior Saturday on the day of the last home football game with other University organizations.

This year, as well as returning to the position of Alumni Representative under Mark O'Rourke's Administration, I was a member of the following University sub-committee's: the Arts and Sciences Curriculum Committee, the Villanova Public Relations Committee and the Rank and Tenure Committee. Through these committees, I have been able to meet and work with many University administrators and faculty.

While at Villanova, I have met with Edward Rideout, who is the director of Annual Giving, and I have a clear understanding of the Universities endowment situation and the plans for the coming Capital Campaign Plan.

I also met with the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., last Monday to explain my intention to work with the university administration next year.

Next year, as your President, as we enter Villanova's Sesquicentennial Year, it is my intention to work with all campus organizations to make it a worthwhile and memorable year for every member of the Villanov community. I am very interested in hearing the concerns of the students and doing all that I can to address them.

I will work to make the ICF (Intercollegiate Forum) an avenue for all student groups to voice their concerns and find support from ohter oranizations. I will work to see that the ideas that have been introduced by student government this year will not be forgotten, as well as work for some of the ideas I feel are important such as spring and fall registration on computer, individual advisors for freshman and sopohomores and a computer lab in the new liberal arts center to alleviate crowding in the Bartley and Tolentine Computer Rooms.

I am serious about Student Government and I am serious about Villanova. I ask everyone who feels this way to elect me Student Government President for the 1992-93 school year on April 1. Thank You.

Mike Zubey

Do you feel that the Student Government has kept you informed of the policies and proposals which affect you as Villanova students? Student Government should include the opinions of the student body in the consideration of what decisions and what goals ought to be pursued. It should not operate and make major decisions without input from a diverse and represented student body. This cannot possibly be attained unless Villanova students are informed about the major policies that will affect us in the future.

In hopes of providing leadership that will address your interests, there are necessary changes which we believe will improve Villanova University.

—An increase in alumni contributions.

—A time-table for the development of west campus, thus moving toward a solution to on-campus problems.

—Joint effort between the students and administration addressing problems of off-campus living.

—Basketball ticket prices comparative to other Big East Universities.

—A time-table for the installation of phone systems in those dorms that need them.

—Improved conditions of the Jake Nevin weight room.

—A revised recycling program and environmentally aware improvements in on-campus eating areas.

—Financial aid opportunities proportionate to a tuition increase.

—Student-run organization to facilitate recruiting in diverse geographical areas.

—Long-term goals: computerized registration and campus credit cards.

A fresh approach is needed. Vote April 1 for Michael Zubey and Christina Cuesta. Thank you.

Senatorial Candidates

Arts and Sciences

Nick Aversa

My name is Nick Aversa and I am a junior political science major. If elected as Arts Senator, I would work for an on-campus bar/nightclub. Another goal of mine is to work with the on-campus political organizations towards improving relations with local authorities to loosen housing restrictions. I would also support the building of fraternity and sorority houses on campus and extending visitation hours in the dormitories.

I have worked on the Bob Langran campaign and through that experience became familiar with township authorities and administrators and their concerns. I hope to use this knowledge to better relations with our area.

I have also worked on various community programs with the elderly and needy children. With this in mind, I hope you will feel confident in voting for me for Arts Senator on April 1.

Kathy Breen

My name is Kathy Breen and I am running for re-election as Arts Senator. For the past three years I have been involved in Student Government.

This year as Arts Senator I represented Villanova at national conventions such as the National Association of Students at Catholic Colleges and Universities (NASCCU).

In addition, I sit on the Executive Committee of the University Senate. As a member of this committee, I have had the opportunity to speak with the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., and the Board of Trustees in order to express the concerns of the student body.

For example, the expansion of the Career Planning and Placement Center and the need for a better advisement system in the college of Arts and Sciences. We have urged that computer facilities on campus be updated, as well as the need for a debit card system in the Connelly Center and the bookstore.

I also sit on the Student Life committee of the University Senate. As a member of this committee, I have expressed the need for revamping the telecommunications program on campus. This would include installation of phones and computers in all dorms.

I wish to utilize my experience to benefit the entire student body. I have developed solid channels of communication with the administration which can help me accomplish the goals I have established. I wish to continue my commitment and continue many of the activities already instituted. Thank you for your continued support.

Sean Ferrier

Villanova is at a historic crossroads witnessed physically by the simultaneous work to refurbish our chapel and the rising of the new Liberal Arts center a few hundred yards away. But much more telling of the University's future direction are items such as the new Core Curriculum, which in its institution has revealed a number of complexities connected with a shift in focus for undergraduate education. These include issues regarding the allotment of faculty to teach the new core courses and the qualifications of faculty members to teach the new requirements.

While efforts must be made to assure the best possible introductory coursework, the University must be careful not to neglect upper-level courses and seminars. The Fine Arts requirement amounts to the implicit creation of a new department in the College of Liberal Arts, the recognition of an extreme need, with the stroke of a pen. The University has finally made some bold initiatives and leadership is needed to make sure that these plans are followed through.

In addition, I have been involved with Villanova's participation in the National Association of Students at Catholic Colleges and Universities, which I feel serves as a good forum for debate among geographically and ideologically diverse students. I am also interested in the Student Government's longtime effort exploring the recreation and 24-hour study space accessible to the future west campus development.

John Fowler

My name is John Fowler and I want to represent you in our Student Government. I was given this opportunity to briefly tell you something about myself and what I am going to do for you. At present, I am a junior in the College of Arts and Sciences, majoring in political science with a minor in economics. I am a member of the NROTC Unit, Big Brothers/Big Sisters, Peace and Justice and a host of other activities. My involvement has given me the opportunity to meet and work with many students of various interests.

It has come to my attention over the course of time that there are many things occurring at Villanova that most of the student body is not informed about. I want to get students actively involved in making the decisions which affect our lives at Villanova. I want to make student government, faculty and administration more accessible to the student body. I want Villanova to undertake programs to make our University more competitive while still holding fast to the Catholic ideals and values which has made Villanova a strong community.

On a concrete note, I want to get phones in dorms which do not have them, computer links to the library, and as your Arts Senator, I want improved advisement in the College of Arts towards academic and professional goals following our undergraduate years.

Thank you and remember to vote on April Fool's Day.

Matthew Haggerty

My name is Matthew Haggerty, and I am a junior political science major from Scranton, Pa. running for Arts Senator.

I think that it is important that each of you know that I am under the belief that in order to be an effective member of the University Senate, a person must have experience in the governing process of Villanova University and exposure to the system in which that process operates. I have to question someone's effectiveness who does not have this exposure and experience.

For the past year, I have worked closely with the outgoing administration as a cabinet member. I served on the Physical Facilities Committee of the Board of Trustees, and along with myself, members included the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., John Gallen, Executive Director for Facilities Management, and several Board members. My role on this committee was to give a student point of view, and an undergraduate perspective on various issues including, west campus expansion, the Lancaster Avenue pedestrian tunnel and the overall appearance of the campus.

I enjoy this type of work, because my philosophy of the University Senate is that student senators could be most effective working in committee, behind closed doors, one-on-one with high level administrators pushing the undergraduate perspective and reminding them about student issues, therefore, keeping them in check.

As a member of the University Senate I will continue my work as a member of various committees and do my best to bring the school administration and the student body together to keep Villanova University moving forward through the 1990s.

Rosanna Picillo

Hello, my name is Rosanna Picillo, and I am running for Arts Senator. I am a sophomore economics major with a history minor. My activities thus far at Villanova have primarily been Greek-oriented. Recently I was elected by Panhellenic representatives to be the incoming assistant Rush Chair. Therefore, I would like to have this opportunity as Arts senator to become more active in the academic environment at Villanova and relay the Arts student body's desires to the Rev. Kail Ellis, O.S.A., Dean of Arts and Sciences.

I spoke with Ellis in an interview this past week and learned of the various changes that will affect Arts and Science students. The new core curriculum will go into effect this coming year for the class of 1996.

It will be a gradual process, starting with the insertion of a core seminar stressing the value of intensive writing skills. This decision to change the curriculum has been discussed since 1988, but I still do not believe the majority of the Arts and Science students were aware of this possibility until recently. As Arts and Science senator I plan to be their strong representative.

I discussed with Ellis the necessity of an Arts and Science computer lab. I suggested that freshman and sophomores need bi-semester advisement from academic advisors to alleviate the process of blindly scheduling classes only to drop them once the student understands what the class truly entails. An extension to the dormitory visitation policy will probably be a long-term project, but in the meantime I will work for individual dorms to have an extension of hours for the study lounges.

All of these improvements are feasible and I will earnestly work for them to come into action. The College of Arts and Science at Villanova has proven itself exceptional.

Yet, with more interaction between the students and administration, through my representation, it will be even better.

Please vote for Rosanna Picillo on April 1, 1992. Thank you.

STUDENT GOVERNMENT ELECTIONS

Senatorial Candidates

Commerce and Finance

Matt Brach

My name is Matthew Brach and I am a junior accounting major with a political science minor. My first proposal as your senator would be for a basketball game for students only to be held in Jake Nevin Fieldhouse. This would allow students from all different aspects of campus life to come together and celebrate school pride and community. The athletic teams are representatives of the student population and we should have an opportunity to show our support for our fellow students.

My next concern will be to keep Fall Break intact and to move spring break to a more preferable time, hopefully a time when our friends at other schools are on break. A publication that will bring students and reputable landlords together is another objective I will try to achieve. This will help students in finding off-campus housing.

Please elect me on April 1 as a senator for the school of Commerce and Finance.

Sebastian Carrado

Hello business balloters! I'd like to take this opportunity to introduce myself. My name is Sebastian Carrado, Seb for short. I have lived for three years in Simpson Hall and will finish my fourth year there as well. I have earned my Simpson nickname of "Veteran."

I am currently a junior management major with hopes of going onto Law School. I am also an Air Force R.O.T.C. Cadet and a member of the Blue Key Society. Being a part of these two organizations as well as a management major has taught me important skills, particularly how to deal with people.

These skills, I feel, are essential to the role of Commerce and Finance Senator. I believe it would be very difficult to function in this people-oriented position without the capacity to listen and communicate. I can bring these skills to the Senate as well as leadership experience, integrity and a keen sense of connection with Villanova. You, the people, are key. There would be no Villanova without the individuals who give it its spirit. I want to capture that spirit and channel it into the issues that concern each one of us.

General issues such as housing, parking and visitation, as well as issues geared more to Commerce and Finance. These issues include new computers in Bartley computer site, the changing curriculum and teacher feedback policies. I cannot promise you success in addressing all your concerns, but I can promise you as Senator that will do everything he possibly can to head us towards a better Villanova future.

It is up to you to start us in that direction, elect me on April 1. I have the ability, I have the commitment, I have the drive ... I need the votes, your votes. Seb Carrado for C & F Senator.

Dan Donovan

The primary purpose of a University Senator is not merely to maintain the present policies but to adjust them according to the current needs of the students.

Accordingly, the core curriculum must be restructured in a way that offers a more diverse education and increases the marketability of each student. Also, academic facilities such as the Commerce and Finance computer room and Falvey library must become more student friendly.

As Villanova continues to become more of a national university, we must assure that our student body reflects this change. By offering equal opportunities to all students, the total Villanova experience will become more valuable.

Yet, changes beyond academics are also needed. Villanova must become a university for its students. In accomplishing this, we must extend parking privileges. Also, athletic facilities must be improved.

Furthermore, the housing problem has to be looked at in a different light. Students must have the backing of the university in solving many of our off-campus problems. Meanwhile there is a need for different policies to serve the on-campus student. Another policy that demands addressing is student athletic ticket prices.

In the end, there is a need to make the student the primary purpose of this university. By representing these needs I hope to become the senator for the students.

Melissa Grimm

This year I served as a Commerce and Finance Student Senator and found myself learning a lot about how the University Senate operates. I gained a lot of experience and insight throughout the year and feel that many student interests can be achieved through perseverance and cooperation.

I am running for a senatorial position again next year in hopes that I can continue pursuing student interests and issues with the insight my past year's experience has given me. Last year I, along with the entire Senate, pursued such issues such as maintaining fall break, getting extended study hours in Bartley Hall, and having the Senior Tailgate Day.

I currently serve on the University Senate Budget Committee as the Secretary, a position which enabled me to represent the students in keeping a tuition increase as low as possible, as well as serving on the Rank and Tenure Committee.

Student Government has the ability to do a lot for students given the desire and interest to work through the university. In this light I feel that if the approriate people are placed in the positions where they can be effective student apathy and concerns can be addressed. I would like the chance to address these issues in the coming year again, and look for your support. Vote Melissa Grimm on April 1.

'Nova alumnus works for kids

By MONTA MONACO

"If you do ordinary things in God's name, they become extraordinary." Jim Murray, a 1960 Villanova graduate, does everything in God's name. So, to fulfill the proverb, nothing he sets out to do would be considered ordinary.

After graduating from Villanova, Murray held a number of jobs, including Villanova Sports Information Director (SID). In the years following his time at Villanova, Murray spearheaded a fund-raising effort originally designed to benefit St. Christopher's Hospital for Children in Philadelphia.

Now, two decades later, Murray's "mustard seed" of a project has blossomed into the creation of 150 Ronald McDonald houses, and the Villanova alumnus finds himself the president of the project's International Advisory Board.

Murray's success is backed by a history of hard work. In 1973, Murray was the assistant public relations director for the Philadelphia Eagles. During this time, one of the players' daughters, a little girl named Kim Hill, was suffering from leukemia. The owner of the Eagles, Leonard Tose, proposed a team fund-raiser to aid the family in paying the hospital bills. The players joined Hill's neighbors in a small effort called "Eagles Fly for Leukemia" and raised funds through a fashion show the group coordinated.

Tose decided that this was not enough and sent Murray to St. Christopher's Hospital for Children to offer a blank check for hospital improvements. In turn, Hill's doctor directed Murray to someone with a greater need — Dr. Audrey Evans, chief of oncology at Children's Hospital in Philadelphia. Evans had never heard of the Eagles, but was willing to accept the generous help Murray offered. "She had a list longer than a football field of what she needed," Murray said.

Tose authorized Murray to pledge $1 million to Evans for hospital repairs. Murray then came up with what he expected to be a financially promising promotional idea. He had a local radio station advertise a four-day radio-thon to symbolize the four quarters of a football game. The Eagles were to play San Francisco, and so a phone number would be broadcast on the screen during the game to accept pledges. As the Eagles fell further and further behind in the game, angered fans called the radio station, not to pledge, but to complain. Murray raised a total of $18 before he turned off the phone lines.

Undiscouraged, Murray and Tose sponsored a benefit dinner and fashion show that raised $125,000. Evans, although obviously appreciative of the support, had a final goal in mind which the benefit's funds did not meet. Murray's commitment to the project was inexhaustible, so Evans came up with an alternative plan.

She directed Murray to the hospital wards where recovering children stayed. Evans suggested building a home for these children and their parents to stay in together with families sharing the same ordeals.

In search of a new fund-raising idea, Murray decided to call a man he knew who was connected with the McDonald's advertising campaign to find out what promotions the food chain had in store for St. Patrick's Day. The reply, much to Irishman Murray's excitement, was Shamrock shakes.

Murray offered Roman Gabriel, the Eagles' quarterback, for the milkshake ad campaign in exchange for a small portion of the proceeds being donated to the project. McDonald's executives offered all of the money from their promotion if the house could be christened the Ronald McDonald House.

With Murray's reply, "You can call it the Hamburglar House if you like," the Ronald McDonald House project began. To this day

Chris Walker shoots and sings

By SUSAN BURNS
Staff Reporter

In a few years, whether you are listening to the radio or watching the Grammy Awards on television, if you hear the name Chris Walker, what will you remember? Most will readily recall Walker as a student with talent on the basketball court as the point guard for the Wildcats. Hopefully many students will also look back on the success of Walker's upcoming musical debut as the opening act for national recording artist Rob Base, playing at Villanova.

For those who want to be able to tell friends the "inside story" of Walker's career, he offered some background on his musical history.

Walker, a native of Houston, Texas, said he began singing in the church choir at age 6. He admits that it was a "family thing." His grandmother played the piano and his two uncles played the guitar and percussion. Music was an essential part of his family life.

But Walker never really took singing seriously nor wrote songs during his younger years. Sports always took precedence over music in his life.

"I didn't get into song writing until my sophomore year in college," Walker said. At that time he began to create song lyrics on a regular basis, drawing upon past experiences and relationships. But he still had no connections in the world of music.

This vital factor changed in October 1991 when Walker discovered Sean Morris, a freshman commerce and finance major. Morris, whose expertise on the keyboard results from 14 years of experience, now composes and plays music to back Walker's lyrics.

"It was a case of being in the right place at the right time," said Morris of his relationship with Walker, his friend and business partner. "After I was introduced to Chris by Ron Wilson, we immediately started putting songs together. Before Christmas break we had 11 or 12 songs completed," said Morris.

During Christmas break Michael Loftus and Tony Tomeldirn, two owners of an independent record label, approached Walker and offered him a contract to record in their studio. Walker and Morris accepted and are presently recording their songs, rehearsing about 15 hours a week in the studio.

Preparations begin for Greek Week

By ELIZABETH HARTNETT
Staff Reporter

Spring is here, and a quick peek outside relays the message that the weather is warm enough for a tanning session. (Okay, it may still be cold, but use your imagination.) Lazily, you pick up a trashy novel reserved for occasions like this when you are trying to avoid writing a philosophy paper.

> Not only is Greek Week a way to raise money, but its coordinators also hope that it will bring together the Villanova community.

You venture toward Sheehan Beach, expecting to find other procrastinators. Searching the Beach for acquaintances, you suddenly freeze, eyes widening with surprise. Panic pours through your body as you peer over your shades to realize that mad charioteers are urging wild 'Novan beasts to pull golden vehicles toward the finish line, through crowds of angry Greeks.

No, you are not suffering from a severe case of heat stroke. Rather, you have wandered directly into the middle of one of next week's most exciting Greek Week events — the chariot races.

In reality, Greek Week is not the blood-thirsty, animalistic endeavor described above. Rather, it is a time for all Villanova fraternities and sororities to get together as a community and celebrate their common bond of "Greekness."

For the past 20 years, Greek Week has been an annual celebration at Villanova. This year the festivities are scheduled to run from March 28 to April 5. Gary Bonas, director of Student Activities, will oversee the events, and the student co-chairs are Julie Rospars and Scott Montigelli.

Two philanthropic causes were chosen this year — Action AIDS and a fund for Bone Marrow donors will benefit from the Greek Week events.

A peculiar event will be held at the University of Pennsylvania specifically to benefit Action AIDS. This event is titled THING-aTHON. Every fraternity and sorority must choose an activity, such as playing cards or monopoly, and perform it for the entire day at the University of Pennsylvania. This particular endeavor,

What do the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Duke Ellington, Jesse Owens and David Dinkins all have in common? They are brothers of Alpha Phi Alpha, a fraternity whose past rivals those of its legendary members.

> "For 85 years Alpha has remained steadfast in its aims of manly deeds, scholarship and the love for all mankind."
> Lawrence Leonard
> senior member

Founded in 1906 by seven black men at Cornell University, Alpha became the first predominatly black, inter-collegiate, Greek-lettered organization in the nation. In the uncertain times only 40 years after the end of slavery, Alpha's founders saw the need for a strong support group in the existing hostile environment.

In its 85-year history, Alpha Phi Alpha has built upon the dreams of its founding members, growing to a membership of 125,000 initiated brothers in its 700 chapters across the globe.

The Psi Chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha, which encompasses the University of Pennsylvania, Drexel University and Villanova University was founded at Penn in 1920. It is now comprised of 21 young men representing the three universities, three of whom are from Villanova. These are senior Lawrence Leonard and sophomores Terence Navin and Adrian Spain.

The Brothers of Alpha Phi Alpha believe in strong community involvement, and take part in numerous varied social causes and activities. One such program is Project Alpha, which deals with teenage pregnancy from the male perspective.

The members are especially proud of an event called the Campus Organized Lectures On Racial Sensitivity (C.O.L.O.R.S.). This three-day event, which is the

Do Greeks rule life at 'Nova?

By MICHAEL GROSSO
Special to the Villanovan

One of the biggest controversies surrounding Villanova social life is whether or not it is completely dependent upon the Greek system. Is it the sole origin of student social life? Or is it simply one of Villanova's most popular student organizations? As Greek Week approaches, Villanova students were asked their opinion on this debate and any compliments or criticisms they might have of Villanova's Greek system.

Sophomore mechanical engineering major Jim Gilchrist, when asked if he believed the Greek system was all Villanova had to offer, pointed to the fact that if it was, "then there would be more than one-third to one-half of the students involved." He also said, "Most, if not all students are happy in their Greek organization. It comes down to a matter of choice as to whether or not you participate."

Judy Robinson, a sophomore human services major, looked at the issue from an individualistic perspective. She felt that a student's life revolves around the Greek system "only if you make it that way." She cited other opportunities for social activities at Villanova. "There is student programming, which provides wonderful events. However, they're non-alcoholic and many students are attracted to a social life which includes alcohol. Bars, off-campus parties and trips to Philadelphia fill the gap."

Commenting on how Villanova's Greek system compared to other schools, Robinson said, "On many other campuses, Greek life is used strictly for a social outlet but I believe that Villanova's Greek system is very strong in philanthropy and in promoting activities that are educational. The only problem I see is that Villanova students are not equally involved in both social and philanthropic activities."

Sophomore economics major John Capeci agreed. "Right now one of the biggest problems I see is that Greeks need to expand their philanthropy activities to a point equal to their social events. However, I do believe they've recognized this problem and are actively trying to correct it." He also pointed to the large Greek population at Villanova as owing to its social prominence. "Traditionally, Greeks are seen as playing a large role in the social aspect of college. But there are many other clubs and organizations at Villanova which offer social activities and an opportunity for personal growth."

"I think that if you're not involved in a fraternity or sorority you have to look harder, but you can still find something to do," said sophomore chemistry major Stacy Gynther.

Sophomores Heather Foldessy and Mary Clare Gartland agreed. "If you're in the Greek system, your activities are set up for you. You can still have a social life without the Greek system, you just have to go out and find what you want to do."

Greg Laurite, a freshman economics major, when asked if he saw any problems with Villanova's Greek system, cited the fact that "many schools have [fraternities and sororities]. If it works for those schools, why shouldn't it work for us?"

"Villanova doesn't provide any on-campus social outlets, so it forces the students to choose between fraternities or sororities and getting a fake ID," said junior accounting major Tom Coyne.

ball, you have to practice to be perfect, but because it's difficult to become perfect, you have to practice," said Walker.

Walker will open for recording artist Rob Base in a concert at Villanova on April 10. Walker plans to play four of his own songs. "Two are slow love ballads, and the other two are what I call "hip-hop flavored rhythm and blues" songs. There's a little rap in some of them, too," Walker said. Morris on keyboard, dancers and back-up vocalists will add to the performance.

Next fall, Walker might have the opportunity to introduce his songs to a wider audience through the production of his first record. "My goal is to top the charts," Walker said with confidence. "I want to create the kind of songs that, no matter what mood you're in, when it comes on the radio, you still like it and it gets you pumped."

In addition, Walker aspires to be like the rhythm and blues musician Teddy Riley, who performs and also assists other singers in their work. "I would like to produce my own songs and then help others to become popular, too," said Walker.

For the time being, Walker will focus on his singing lessons, rehearsals and creative efforts. His family and teammates will continue to support his work, and perhaps soon Walker will achieve all of his goals. Morris praises Walker's talents and predicts with certainty, "He will definitely go far in the music business."

Ronald McDonald Houses

Murray is in awe of the smile that just the name Ronald McDonald brings to children.

Another former Villanovan, John Canuso, became involved with the building portion of the project. Canuso's daughter also suffered from leukemia. Murray's team had found a typical college house in Philadelphia that looked as if "some of the pre-med students had conducted a few experiments inside."

Murray challenged Canuso to finish renovations on the house in three weeks. On October 15, 1974 the first Ronald McDonald House opened for business. Those seven rooms were the beginning of a miracle, said Murray. On October 12, 1991 the 150th house was opened.

Ray Kroc, the founder of McDonalds, donated $25,000 out of his own pocket to every new house that was built until his death a few years ago. Ronald McDonald Children's Charities was founded in his name and has donated over $40 million to children's causes.

Joining McDonalds in supporting the foundation are big name companies such as Scott Paper, Walden Books, General Electric and Coca-Cola. The fact that these competing companies come together to support this cause really amazes Murray. He attributes the foundation's success to the fact that "it is exactly what it seems to be. It is a real anomaly in our society."

> "The Ronald McDonald House may just be one of Villanova's greatest miracles."
> Jim Murray

The families do not have to pay anything to stay in the houses if they cannot afford it, but usually the guests like to contribute $5 to $15 a night for the duration of their stay.

"There is no way to put a price on what happens in these houses," said Murray. "Families fall in love with each other and help each other out in these tough times."

The Ronald McDonald House is a non-profit organization and all of the people who work there are volunteers, including Murray. Because of what he terms T-N-T (taxes'n'tuition), Murray also has his own sports marketing company.

Murray and the house volunteers see the end results of their work every day. Just recently, a guest in the Philadelphia house, a little girl named Valerie Cessaro who was diagnosed with terminal cancer, said that she would like to see "The Phantom of the Opera." Murray visited Villanova to speak with Chi Omega, a sorority on campus that plans to make the Ronald McDonald House its philanthropy this semester. He told the women about Cessaro, and one of the sisters, Elyse Hansen, was able to take Cessaro to see the show. Sixteen-year-old Cessaro died a few days after the performance. But, thanks to Murray's devotion, not before her last wish was granted.

The newest Ronald McDonald House in Philadelphia is located at 3925 Chestnut St. Volunteers can contact the staff there at (215) 387-8406. Murray urges students to become involved with the houses. "The Ronald McDonald House may just be one of Villanova's greatest miracles," said Murray.

Top 10

Hot off the presses in 201 Dougherty are the Top 10 tips on how to celebrate Earth Day Villanova-style, as compiled by a few politically correct Villanovans.

10. Carpool — two people in a Beamer are better than one.
9. Refuse to use your credit card for a day. Plastic is bad for the environment.
8. Convince Barleycorn's to donate 10 cents from every beer you buy after happy hour to a worthy cause.
7. Coordinate your wardrobe for the day — wear earth tones.
6. Drink beer out of recyclable cups.
5. Better yet, bag the cups completely and drink right from the keg.
4. Tell a professor that you absolutely cannot hand in your paper because you are trying to save forests.
3. Only write positive things on the desks in Falvey, like "Save the @?#@ rainforests."
2. Cut class — Novans don't need an excuse to do that anyway.

And the No. 1 way to celebrate Earth Day like a true Villanovan:
1. Forget about it completely.

first of its kind in the nation, is aimed at eliminating ignorance and fostering sensitivity between groups of different race, ethnicity and gender.

The group also offers a lecture series entitled "A New Survival Agenda for the African-American," which deals with the problems affecting the black community. Psi Chapter is also involved with "Meals on Wheels," the Ronald McDonald House, voter registration drives and the Philadelphia Cub Scouts.

The fraternity, which has been inter-racial since 1945, has as its membership requirement only the desire to help the community. Leonard defined the group as highly selective, with its small size contributing to a strong sense of brotherhood. The community programs are accomplished thoroughly and successfully due to the lasting friendships made and the sense of belonging present in the fraternity.

ΑΦΑ

In addition to the lecture series Alpha Phi Alpha sponsors at Villanova, students may have seen the brothers "stepping" at various times on campus. Spain described this form of dance as a friendly competiton in which Alphia Phi Alpha takes part to celebrate their allegiance to and respect for their fraternity and the African heritage. He stated that although it is something they enjoy, it is not the only aspect of their fraternity for which they want to be known.

Leonard sees as one of their most important goals announcing their presence in the community by making a difference through hands-on experience.

"For 85 years Alpha has remained steadfast in its aims of manly deeds, scholarship and the love for all mankind. Psi Chapter has upheld these same lofty aims for 71 years. All of the above programs are for the benefit of the community. These programs imbue Alpha men with a sense of pride and determination which allows us to avoid the pitfalls that entrap so many of our fellow African-American males in this society. This inner confidence has allowed succeeding generations of Alpha men to rise to the call of leadership within our respective communities," said Leonard.

Viewpoint: 'Nova's social life

"Although the Greek system is the most recognized and publicized organization on campus, there are other things Villanova offers, but you need to look for them."

Sue D'Isabel, a junior English major, stated that "if you are a member of the Greek system, social life does revolve around it; if you're not, then it doesn't." She also felt that in terms of problems with Villanova's Greek system, "Rush is horrendous."

Juniors Amy McLeod and Glen Peacock each had criticisms of the Greek system. "I think that it is elitist because it excludes many people," said McLeod.

"I think it puts too much emphasis on people conforming to what a Greek should be. It limits diversity," Peacock said.

Eric Ricciardi had an opposing opinion. "The Greek system is at the center of Villanova social life. I think, at other universities, it is much more difficult to participate in Greek life. But here at Villanova, the fraternities and sororities seem open to all students."

'Nova celebrates Greek Week

to be held April 4, will include Greeks from Villanova, Drexel, Penn and St. Joseph's University.

Back on 'Nova's campus, various events such as six-man relays, swimming and boat races, skit night and the aforementioned chariot races will take place next week. There will also be a Helen of Troy/Hercules contest. Fraternities and sororities can place their nominees in Dougherty's Pie Shop. For a small fee, students can vote for their favorite.

All Greek Week events are a way to get Greeks together "as well as to raise money," according to Rospars. It is a time to raise fraternal and sororal spirit and show the support that the Greek system encourages students to have for each other. For Bonas, Greek Week is an "exciting time ... for all chapters to celebrate their Greekness through athletic and non-athletic inter-chapter competition."

Greek Week events are not limited merely to the brothers and sisters; non-Greek students are also encouraged to come out for the events. Skit night is open to all students, with a small admission fee which is contributed to charity. Not only is Greek Week a way to raise money, but its coordinators also hope that it will bring together the Villanova community.

'One Acts' represents new approach

By NATHAN NASSIF
Staff Reporter

Villanova Student Theatre's bold and daring production, "A Night of One Acts," was held in St. Mary's theater before a full-house anxiously waiting to see young Villanovans perform.

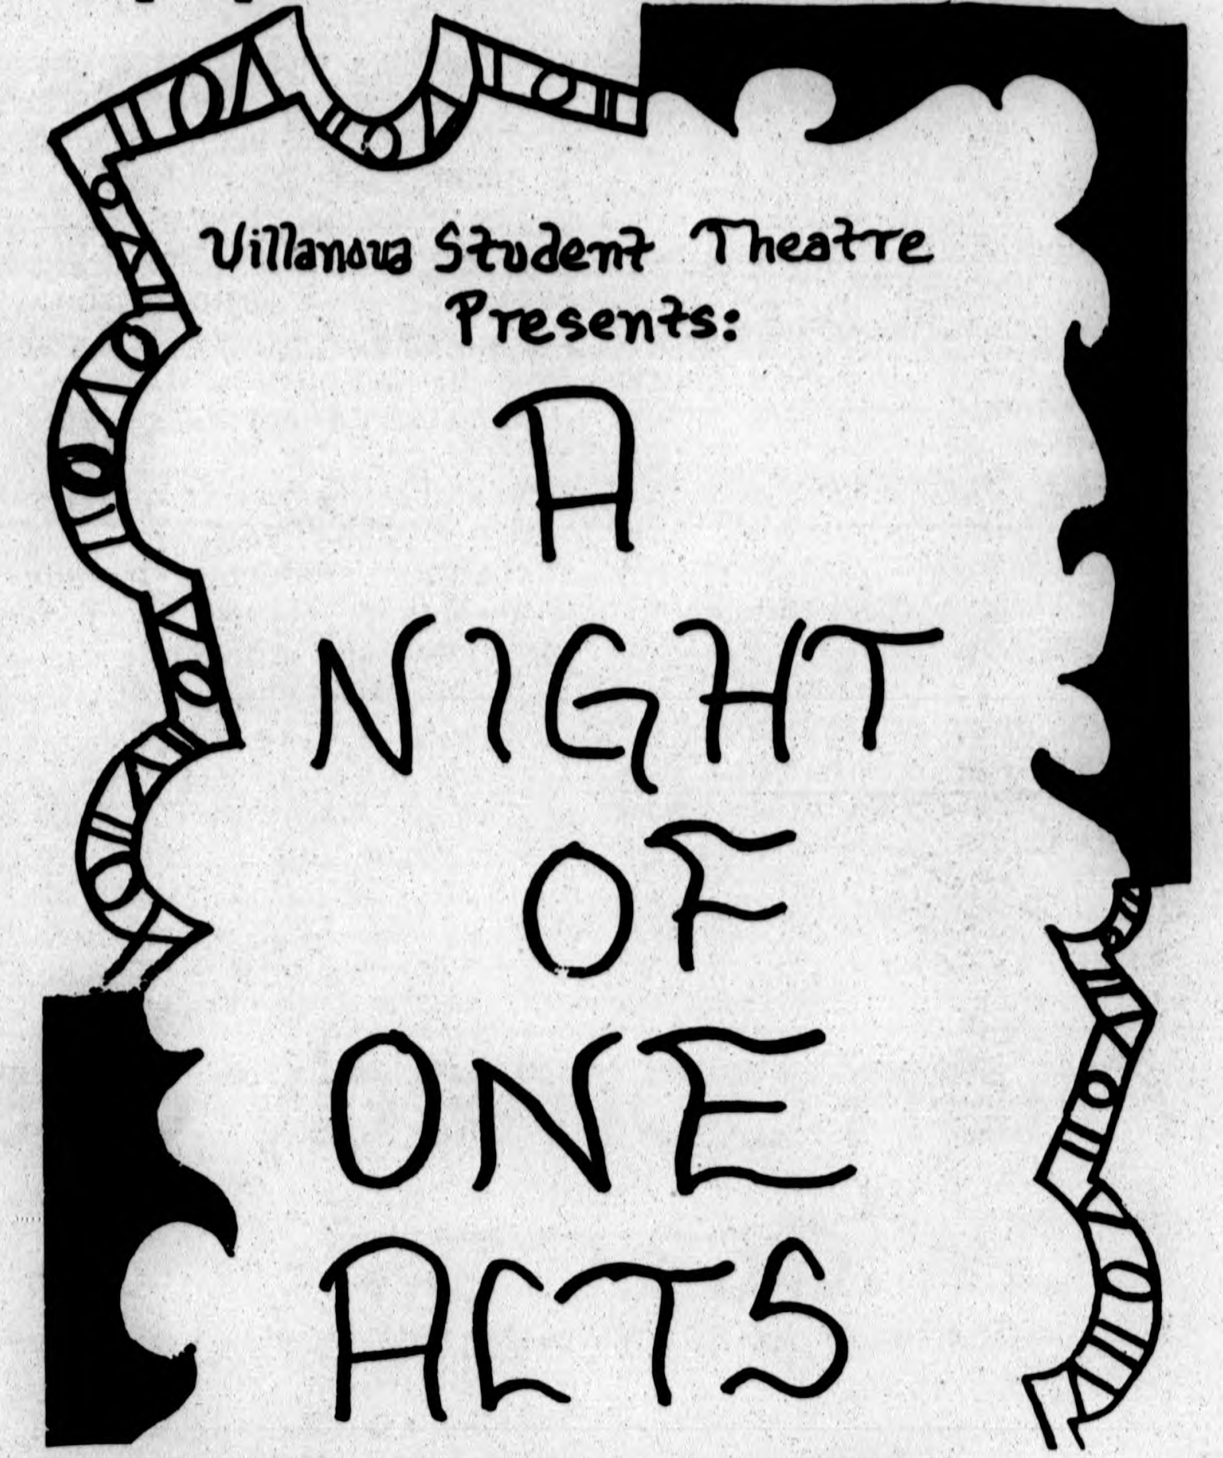
The first act, "Gender Bender," starring Brian Gillin and Sue Roth, was a disturbing tale of two transsexuals and would ultimately set the tone for the entire evening. The potential for an interesting look at the life of these transsexuals was somewhat clouded by an overbearing amount of obscenities blurted out by the actress who was struggling with the transition from female to male. Had the volume of these obscenities been lowered, and the actor been made expressive in a less offensive and more straightforward method, the audience's identification with the character would have been better accomplished.

"Generations" followed and proved to be fatiguing to a degree due to its static environment. This enigmatic creation story was performed by two characters (Christian and Adrian Ready). The robotic tone of the one actor was confusing, and soon after the actress sang what was supposedly to be the first song, one major question lurked: how could she sing a song when 'song' or 'singing' had not been created? Although the writing was less potent in this act, its flavor was dulled by strange tones and subject matter. The author's attempt to make a philosophical statement by offering an original interpretation of the creation story was the redeeming quality of this play.

The third act touched upon some more identifiable topics — more real life issues. There were three benches positioned differently in an imaginary park. Different stories occurred on each bench, and the play was appropriately titled "Bench Talk." Presented here were several people dealing with different everyday situations, such as a mother/daughter dilemma, regretting life instead of just living it and finding religious identity. The words here were enough to peak the audience's interest, but what resulted was a restless atmosphere where the message of each issue was lost by a lack of focus on a single conversation. Had this act been shorter and more relaxed, loosening its stress on the issues at hand, this act could have been more entertaining.

Matters certainly became slightly better with the last act, "Home Free!!" Two of the best actors (Matthew Schneck and Maryellen Summers), along with the other two invisible ones, performed this act. Their abilities could not piece together the audiences' puzzlement concerning their incestual relationship, but they did manage to provide the viewers with a glimpse into the realm of insanity. There were also references to being 'blue,' or being a blue baby, but the significance of this motif remained unexplained.

It is important to note that these acts were often disturbing and confusing, causing spectator minds thirsting for entertaining subject matter to expand their definition of entertainment to include thought provoking topics. One cannot denigrate the actors' efforts, which in this case were noteworthy considering the weak material with which they had to work. Although the writing often left the audience desiring more, the topics covered were groundbreaking, and for the conservative atmosphere of Villanova, important issues were raised.



Harry Connick, Jr. packs the Paramount

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

"If I'm gonna sweat in a tuxedo ... I wanna hear some screaming!" demanded New York's hottest item, Harry Connick, Jr. In a series of 15 sold-out performances at the revamped Paramount Theater, Connick proved why he is truly a 'boy-wonder' on Mar. 21.

Opening with his scat-induced, "It's Alright With Me" only to instantaneously bring it down for the intimate ballad, "Don't Get Around Much Anymore," Connick created the perfect balance with his musical/vocal talent and grand personality that kept the show at a fast pace.

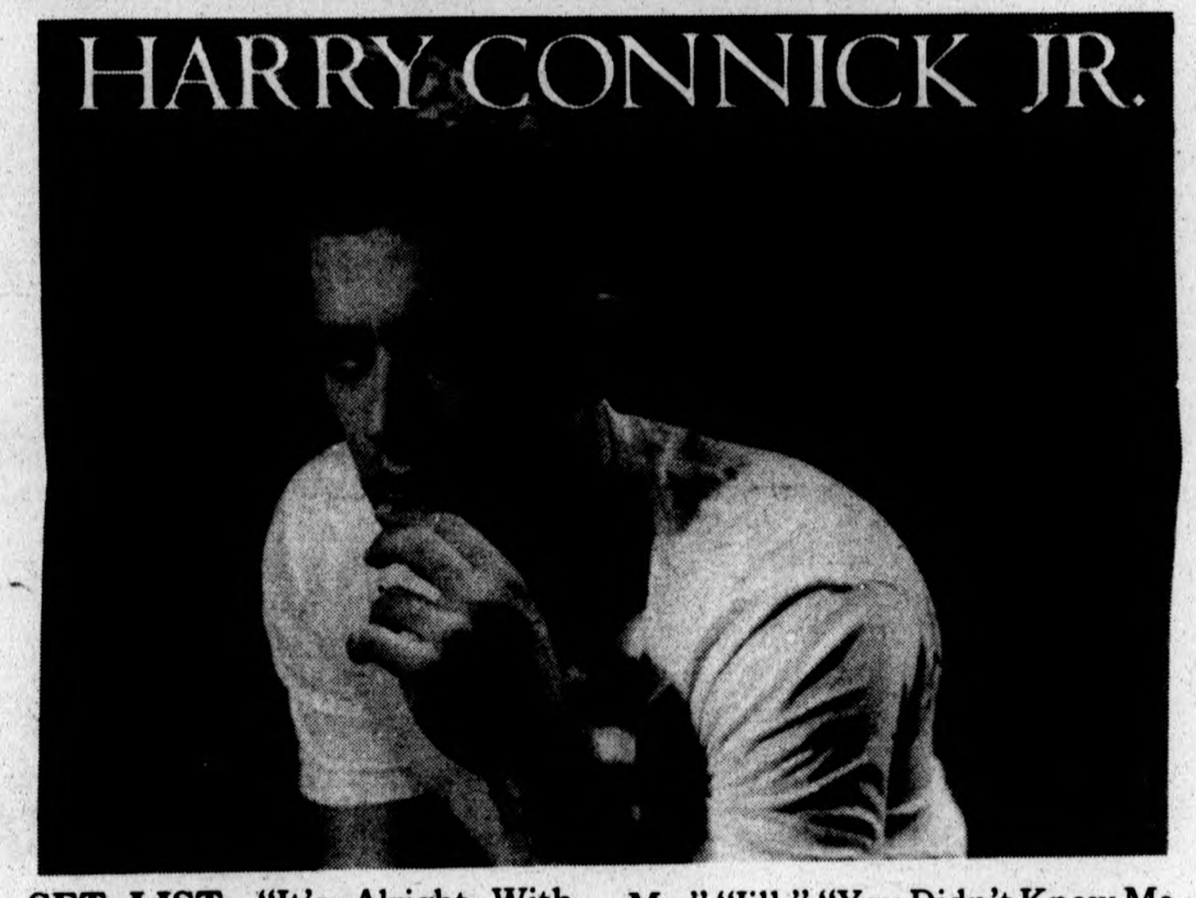
Connick endeared himself immediately to the mainly middle-aged corporate crowd as he let his little 8-year-old friend Pete perform an instrumental version of "Mac the Knife" on his Baby Grand after renditions of his hits "Recipe For Love" and "I Could Write a Book."

What was sheerly amazing about Connick his sense of timing. During his instrumental version of "Sweet Georgia Brown" Connick carried the beat alongside the piano, on his lap, through his tap dancing-shuffling feet and back to his ivories. Here he proved his sense of rhythm while turning it around a moment later to the love ballad, "Jill," dedicated to his Victoria's Secret model-fiancee Jill Goodacre.

The one guitar, one bass, one drum, four trombones, four trumpets, two tenor sax, two baritone sax, and one clarinet orchestra arrangement seat nestled in an all white podium, with each shade of colored lights reflected on them throughout the performance, similar to Ricky Ricardo's Tropicana house band. Their sound blended perfectly with Connick's sultry vocals and freewheeling piano solos that echoed throughout the theater for the entire evening. Connick graciously shared the spotlight with power house band that even blew himself away. During each jam session Connick was so enthused he evoked a kid in a sandbox sharing a pile of toys with his friends.

He soon returned to the microphone running into his double-header of hits "We Are In Love" and "It Had To Be You" only to close the show with the graceful medium-paced, "All of Me." Connick suddenly returned with opening act, Raymond Miles and the Rams choir, for a run through of "Glory Hallelujah."

The reason for Connick's appeal is strictly due to his ability to resurrect Big Band music into a new generation and expose it to those who would not normally listen. His hook is his dedication and sincerity as he performs his songs with the same warmth that was portrayed years ago in the old recordings. He is not Sinatra ... simply because he is Connick — a young man with more musical talent than most whose rhythm is as sweet as it sounds.



HARRY CONNICK JR.

SET LIST: "It's Alright With Me," "Don't Get Around Much Anymore," "Recipe For Making Love," "I Could Write a Book," "Bare Necessities," "With Imagination (I'll Get There)," "Time After Time," "Sweet Georgia Brown," "Your Love Belongs to Me," "Jill," "You Didn't Know Me When," "He Is They Are," "We Are In Love," "It Had To Be You," "Just Kiss Me" and "All of Me." ENCORES: "Glory, Hallelujah" (w/gospel singer Raymond Miles and the Rams choir).

Eddie Money takes the road less traveled

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

*David J. Criblez spoke to Eddie Money in an exclusive interview for the Villanovan.

Just the hint of his raspy voice and screaming sax have carried Eddie Money on for years. Ed's a man you want on your team. He may not be the biggest or best of the bunch but you can always count him in on the action. He's a man whose heart is in the right place, in the streets instead of below the belt rock.

VILLANOVAN: Apparently you are in the midst of experimenting with your live show ... what's all that about?

MONEY: "We're doing this acoustic show now that's really kicking. It's giving me a chance to do songs I haven't done in a long time. When you make 10 albums and you keep playing the same songs over and over, a lot of songs get lost under the deck. When it comes to music there's nothing wrong with dealing from the bottom of the deck. My juices are flowing ... this show really connects with my new album (Right Here) which is really super Eddie Money. It's cool."

V: What has the audience reaction been?

MONEY: "They're going completely bananas! Because of the recession I'm working smaller venues but I'm using it to my advantage, creating that intimate feeling. It's a great show. I'm not doing all the greatest hits ordeal. I'm doing songs I wanna do. I'm sick n' tired of the audience controlling my destiny wanting the hits all the time."

V: Where do you trace your roots to?

MONEY: "I'm a songwriter, I'm a musician ... I saw Cream at Whisky a-Go-Go back in 1967, I saw Jimi Hendrix 30 feet from me for three dollars in Stony Brook, I saw Led Zeppelin open for Country Joe and the Fish. My music is very late sixties oriented. Now we got this acoustic wall of sound coming at ya and it's cool."

V: It's been said that you were unhappy with Sounds of Money, your greatest hits album. What happened?

MONEY: "Everybody took control. Everybody loves me and they want me to be successful so they come up with these great ideas. Basically they all turn into my mother. They drive me crazy. I go back with the record company 15 years and things out of focus with a song called, 'Stop Stepping on My Heart' which in my mind shold be called 'Stop Stepping on My B--s.' Things got outta hand but now I'm in control."

V: Why did you part ways with your old producer Richie Zito?

MONEY: "Richie was busy at the time but he also was into using outside writers like on the Nothing to Lose album which, I felt, made me lose touch as a writer. Things became too restricting. With the new LP, I worked on a more simplistic level with a 16-track machine instead of playing 'beat the demo.' Rather than lose the spontaneity and the magic, I finished the songs off and handed it into the record company, as is."

V: What is most important to you when recording?

MONEY: "The lyric is always the most important thing to me as well as the vocals. I use musicians that will appreciate the vocal as much as I do. Then they embrace it. It's like I'm the quarterback and they are my team. My guitar players are like my front

'Dragon' soars through the Arden Theater

By VALERIE JOYCE
Staff Reporter

People are getting pretty fired up in Philadelphia these days. That is, those people who see the Arden Theater Company's latest production, "The Dragon." Under the hand of Producing Artistic Director Terrence J. Nolen, the Philadelphia premiere of Yevegeny Shvartz's adult fairy tale "The Dragon" soars through the Arden, and warms audiences' hearts.

This hilarious debunking of political tyranny follows Sir Lancelot (a distant relative of the fabled white knight) on his quest to slay the dragon that has terrorized an innocent town. Robert Cristophe, an Arden veteran, is charming as Sir Lancelot, who goes into battle with nothing more than a blue plastic bed pan, a silver tray, a flying carpet and plenty of faith in the might of right.

The infamous Dragon is surprisingly suave as he enters the scene in a black sequined shirt, 'charming to his loyal subjects and even to the intruder Lancelot. This lasts until Lancelot opens his mouth, and the Dragon roars comparably to a concord take-off.

Other characters in this enchanting production include The Mayor, played by Tom McCarthy, who suffers hilariously from every known nervous disease (plus three that haven't been identified yet), the mayor's son Henry, portrayed by Peter Pryor, whose silly slapstick provides an amusing contrast to his employer the Dragon, and Elsa, the virgin promised to the Dragon, played by Suzanne O'Donnell.

Rounding out the cast are Thomas Wheeler and Jilline Ringle who become a number of delightful characters, play with puppets in cardboard costumes and perform amusing Valley Girl imitations. Wheeler is also the man behind the talking cat from whom Sir Lancelot learns the legend of the Dragon.

The background music in this production, original music performed by John Stovicek, is wonderful and lends to the magic of the fairy tale. The colorful set of this fanciful kingdom consists of designer Janet Cleveland's larger than life cut-out puppets and backdrops.

For a break from the drudgery of school work, check out this enchanting adult fairy tale at the Arden Theater Company in Center City. The production runs from March 12 — April 12.

Allen comedy assembles flawless cast

By GEORGE KAPLAN
Staff Reporter

Woody Allen manages to accomplish the impossible once more in the aptly-named "Shadows and Fog." This time, however, the achievement is not worthy of pride. The director has assembled a cast that includes Jodie Foster, Mia Farrow, John Cusack, John Malkovich, Madonna and Kathy Bates, yet was not able to make an entertaining film.

The plot of this homage to the German expressionistic film movement of the early 20th-century revolves around a midnight murderer on a killing spree in a small European town. Allen plays his trademark role of the nebbish neurotic forced by his environment to confront his fears. In the course of the film, he joins various factions in catching the murderer. He befriends a circus sword-swallower (Farrow), who has left her philandering husband (Malkovich), meets a group of introspective hookers, enlists the aid of an atheist mortician and is turned away by former lovers.

> These ingredients would all be very interesting if Allen knew what to do with them.

These ingredients would all be very interesting if Allen knew what to do with them. The usual themes he works into his movies are all here, such as the obsessions with love and death, but the script is uncharacteristically weak. The most interesting feature of the film is the dark gothic setting, but even this has been used in many other films. The story is mostly aimless and one does not care for the characters as one would expect.

Despite its faults, however, the cast is flawless. There is not a single actor who does not try to make the most of the shaky characters with which they are provided. Cusack and Malkovich are particularly good. There are also a few Allen one-liners that make most of what passes for comedy films today seem like Friday night sitcoms.

"Shadows and Fog" is for Woody Allen fans only. Others will have to wait for the director to create movies as good as his "Manhattan," "Purple Rose of Cairo" and "Hannah and Her Sisters."

Blonde captures energy

By MAURA RURAK
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Concrete Blonde strikes a familiar chord with their recent release Walking in London. Once again, the trio manages to complete a CD filled with haunting sounds and strong images thanks to the deep, husky voice of lead singer Johnette Napolitano.

Although the group's focus is obviously on the unique tone created by Napolitano, the tracks are completed and sustained by background guitars and percussion. Concrete Blonde does not deviate from the sound that made their first three albums an underground success and pushed "Joey" from Bloodletting onto the Billboard charts.

Even though the album is not aimed at falling into the mainstream, "Walking in London" has a chance at commercial approval where as the dignified and mystic "Les Coeurs Jumeaux" sung in French will probably be overlooked. The cover of James Brown's "It's a Man's Man's Man's World" takes on new meaning when sung by a female and "Ghost of a Texas Ladies Man" tells an amusing tale.

Concrete Blonde is yet another band that does not seem to fit into any specific musical genre. They are certainly not heavy nor are they really soft and smooth. They are not a progressive band in terms of the club scene, but they do represent an alternative form of music. Regardless, this Hollywood-based band stayed close to home in Santa Monica to record Walking in London.

The potential of Concrete Blonde has failed to be fully tapped. Napolitano's voice is so strong that she could carry a solo effort with great ease. The beautiful quality about the band is that she has chosen to make her career a collaborative effort with the emphasis on the music and not on exploiting her highly marketable sound. With this type of attitude about their music Concrete Blonde will continue to make albums such as Walking in London for years to come.

line. My keyboardist is my wide receiver."

V: Your recent hit, "I'll Get By" is a very strong ballad. What is its center?

MONEY: "It's funny how the ballad came about. It's a very haunting song and it was released just as my dear friend and manager, Bill Graham, died. I loved him like a dad. You can substitute the woman in that song for someone you really care about; it works. We even shot the video the day after we buried him. It's a tribute to him."

V: What role did Bill Graham play in your life?

MONEY: "He was my manager. It's like my father ... How much should I listen to my father? Wash my hands before dinner, study once a month, put gas in the car. I've experienced death before. My mixing guy, who was 24 years-old, died two years ago; we buried him in his tour jacket. Death is a part of life ... you lose people."

V: You always say that when you look in the mirror, you realize you have a goal in life — what is that goal?

MONEY: "As my mother would say, which is really corny, but, I have this gift that I can sing and express myself. I'm glad others can enjoy it as much as I do. I appreciate the communication I have with the people."

V: How would you describe your place in rock music?

MONEY: "I always get on the radio and I love writing. Even Vince Neil (formerly of Motley Crue), said to me 'I use to do 'Two Tickets' in a bar band years ago I was raised on you.' Even the Guns N'Roses guys enjoy my work; it rubs off on them. So my place is right where it is. I'm comfortable. I'm not knocking walls down but I had my days of doing that."

V: The '70s was a wild period. Not many groups/artists made it through, however you did. Does that give you a certain confidence?

MONEY: "Not really, everything goes one day at a time with me. There were groups like Walter Egan, he kinda disappeared, the Babys broke up, Bad Company broke up, and Crosby Stills and Nash stopped touring. Acts got burnt out. My flame is always at a steady super brightness. It never burns out, it just gets brighter every year."

V: You once described your life like a battle of the bands situation. Do you still feel like that?

MONEY: "Nah, I'm comfortable cause it's like a snowball fight and I've been doing snowballs for the last 15 years. I got plenty. Music is competitive but I never feel on the spot."

V: You seem to have found your way about the radio dial over the past 15 years very well, a key to success. How do you keep it up?

MONEY: "Radio seems to know what they are doing. The best songs possibly written will find their way on radio. It's like a common denominator. I feel lucky to be someone who gets on. It's wonderful people that dig my could turn on an oldies station and hear 'Two Tickets' or turn on an easy listening station and hear 'I'll Get By' or flip to AOR radio and hear 'She Takes My Breath Away.' So I'm all over the place."

V: You have your own family that you are close to, do things get complicated on the road?

MONEY: "No, my wife and kids come with me. They love it. They get to see 'Home Alone' and 'Robin Hood' 15 times at each hotel! I've got Cinderella and Snow White on the bus for them, I'm telling ya."

V: Where is your heart set?

MONEY: "I'm basically a kid from the streets in an upper class neighborhood. I'll always be from the streets. I didn't work for 15 years — that's what you call livin' on the street, jack. I had nothing but rock-n-roll."

Racy 'Instinct' bares all

By AARON NICODEMUS
Entertainment Editor

Sex sells. Sex sells cars, sex sells beer and yes, sex sells movies. We live in a culture that is saturated with images of scantily-clad beauties flaunting themselves for the sake of a product. Not that it is all bad, but we have become desensitized as a result of the constant bombardment.

"Basic Instinct" is a racy Hitchcockian killer that for all its hot scenes could be renamed "Basic Intercourse." Case in point: the film opens with a man and a woman, naked and in bed, both seemingly ready to explode. The woman sensuously ties his hands to the headboard with a white silk scarf. Just as they approach their peaks, the woman reaches over and slams an ice pick into her victim, repeatedly, as blood spurts all over. Do we have an idea where this one is going?

Michael Douglas stars as Nick Curran, a San Francisco detective who is chasing the ice pick thriller while running from his own traumatic memories. Sharon Stone is the cold bisexual heiress whose character has been the focus of controversy within the gay community. Her lesbian tendencies are evident, but are not worthy of such uproar. "Basic Instinct" also bashes policemen, psychiatrists and rock stars, yet only homosexuals take it to heart. The lack of positive role models in Hollywood is not the fault of this film.

Catherine Trammell (Stone) becomes the prime suspect in the gruesome killing because her latest novel describes the crime in exact detail. The victim, rock star Johnny Boz, happens to be her boyfriend. Her other novels have also had an unnerving way of predicting similarly grisly crimes, so that even a pattern of psychosis is established.

Nick has his problems too — he cannot escape his bad habits, including drug abuse, alcoholism, chain smoking and an insatiable lust for beautiful women. His last weakness is fulfilled on-screen in four long and explicit sex scenes, three with Stone and one with his psychiatrist (Jeanne Tripplehorn). All the characters have an uncanny knack for spending as much time in their beds as they do in their clothes.

"Basic Instinct" does accomplish something besides stirring up moral indignation. It has a dramatic action and suspense and the killer's identity provides a surprise. The actual plot does nothing new or different, and at times appears rather stilted and mechanical. Douglas and Stone give revealing performances, to say the least, and Stone's portrayal is imbued iciness and passion. The implausible script and its ridiculous ending leaves the viewer unfulfilled, something that cannot be said for any of its characters. Hitchcock, the suspense film king of subtlety, is rolling in his grave.

FAST FORWARD: Just in time for baseball's opening day, "The Babe" stars John Goodman as the venerable and pudgy major leaguer, Babe Ruth. The film focuses on the Babe's lengendary status and baseball as it once was, without the emphasis on money and more on the pure enjoyment of playing the game. "The Babe" opens April 17.

Dolly Parton stars in "Straight Talk," as a wide-eyed ex-dance instructor who heads to big-city Chicago and becomes a celebrity talk show host. There's one catch — she has to pretend to be a doctor, something her promoters convince her is done all the time. James Woods stars as the private detective tracking her real story. "Straight Talk" opens in early April.

REWIND: One of 1991's most impressive stories, "The Fisher King," opens on videocassette this week. Jack Lucas (Jeff Bridges) is a radio talk show host whose sardonic wit is taken literally by one listener, indirectly causing a shotgun massacre at a Manhattan bar. Robin Williams, once a college professor, had his life shattered when his wife was killed in the shooting. Now he is a slightly off-center homeless crusader who sees himself as the lone fighter for justice on the streets. His quest for a "Holy Grail" he has seen in a magazine leads him to believe it is hidden within a Park Avenue mansion. Williams' performance earned him an Oscar nomination, for Best Actor.

CLIPS: "Cape Fear," with the demonic Robert DeNiro, plays at the Connelly Center Cinema on Friday, March 27. Nick Nolte stars as a flawed defense attorney whose family is chased by a disturbed ex-con (DeNiro) bent on revenge. Jessica Lange is Nolte's wife, and newcomer Juliette Lewis gives a stellar performance as their daughter.

Roxy goes for the throat

By DAVID J. CRIBLEZ
Senior Reporter

ROCK QUARRY

Just when you thought the metal scene was crammed with unnecessary bands that last ... oh, two or three months then pile up into the Headbanger's Ball graveyard, along comes Roxy Blue. So what's so great about another bunch of loud hair heads with big mouths and small brains? Well . . . they can rock.

On their debut record, Want Some? Roxy follows the formula of rockers and ballads with a token cover song (the Who's "Squeeze Box") for added flash. Even the inside cover sports the boys: Todd Poole (vocals), Sid "Boogie" Fletcher (lead guitar), Josh Weil (bass) and Scotty T (drums) at a Go-Go bar in tight jeans and leather a.k.a. packaged.

The music, however, is rather likeable, making Roxy a cut above the other metal maniacs that float about in a teenage wasteland. A large part of the successful sound is derived from producer Mike Clink (Guns N'Roses). Opener "Too Hot To Handle" and "Rob the Cradle" are tongue-in-cheek songs with maximum volume and a clear rhythm section.

Frontman Poole tends to cheapen the record by doing a David Lee Roth 'hey-baby-want-a-hotdog-to-go-with-that-shake' routine that has already run stale, even for Roth himself. However, the ballads "Times Are Changin'," "Luv On Me" and "Nobody Knows" are of high quality and steer clear of the rest of the album's cliches. But regardless, what do all these things mean when it comes down to banging your head?

Tears For Fears are underrated to the utmost extreme. Sure they had a tremendously successful LP a few years ago (Songs From the Big Chair) does that mean they should be branded pop and written off for the rest of their career? Listen to their new greatest hits compilation, Tears Roll Down 82-92 and your faith will be restored.

The real tragedy of this album is its premature uprising. Tears is still going strong, see new track, "Laid So Low (Tears Roll Down)," as the band reaches its decade anniversary.

In doing so, predictable hits "Everybody Wants to Rule the World," "Head Over Heels," "Shout," "Mother's Talk," "I Believe" and "Pale Shelter" are all present and as sweet as ever.

"Sowing the Seeds of Love" and "Woman in Chains" are the album's shining moments on the greatest hits as well as being material from their last LP. Tears are still rolling but act as a tease. They must collect themselves and record a new full piece . . . please guys, please?!?

SINGLE SPOTLIGHT: U2's new maxi-single for "One" is almost a mini album within itself. Clocking in at 20 minutes, the four song compilation is half covers and half new material. The feature of course is "One" from their ground-breaking new LP, Achtung Baby, that soars high running alongside ballad-like singles "Bad," and "Running to Stand Still." The gem of this piece is their studio cover of Lou Reed's "Satellite of Love" (which they do perform live on their "Zoo TV" tour). Another cover, Cole Porter's "Night and Day (Steel String Remix)," stands strong while Baby leftover, "Lady With the Spinning Head" also rests here as an added attraction. All profits from the single will go to AIDS research.

PEBBLES: Anthrax has axed lead singer Joey Belladonna as they signed a new contract with Elektra Records ... The Cure swings around again April 21 with Wish ... Madonna has recently renegotiated her record contract with Warner Brothers. She now has a $60 million dollar contract that obligates her to record seven more LPs for the label as she will received $5 million for each LP, up front ... Tracy Chapman will return April 28 with her new album, Matters of the Heart, with guests Roy Brittan, Vernon Reid (Living Colour) and Mike Campbell (Petty's Heartbreakers) ... Greatest hits packages from ZZ Top and Lionel Richie will soon arrive each with a small handful of new tracks. The Top tracks include new single, "Gun Love" and a remake of Elvis' "Viva Las Vegas." ... A peek into the June forecast predicts new efforts from Peter Gabriel, The Ramones and yes those queens of pop (NOT!) Wilson Phillips ... The man who wears his sunglasses at night, Corey Hart, is in the loop with Attitude & Virtue. Guns N'Roses bassist Duff McKagan guest sports here ... Comedians Weird Al Yankovic and Andrew Dice Clay give it another go around with Off the Deep End and 40 Too Long ...

'Kings' soundtrack enlivens mambo sound

By JOHN KAZMIERCZAK
Staff Reporter

The evocative music found in Armand Assante's latest motion picture, "The Mambo Kings," has been distilled into a soundtrack featuring 16 cream-of-the-crop mambo tracks. For those unfamiliar with mambo, it is a Cuban-based style of music, incorporating both jazz and blues. Mambo's popularity peaked in post-World War II American society. The music is intriguing in that it is such a broad and indistinct category; songs can range from slow, soulful ballads to jam-session, quick dance tunes.

"The Mambo Kings" soundtrack features both great old masters of the art such as Tito Puente and Beny More and new-to-mambo performers Linda Ronstadt and Los Lobos.

Puente steals the show early on with two classics "Ran Kan Kan" and "Cuban Pete" (written in 1957 and 1936, respectively). Puente's band features 22 musicians, most of them dedicated to sax, trombone and trumpet, and they are put to good use. Their mixture of background and interplay with the timbales and congas on Puente's first two tracks falls nothing short of incredible. Later, in "Para Los Rumberos," Puente's third and last song, the horns finally manage to upstage the percussion and take the spotlight.

> Mambo is a Cuban-based style of music incorporating facets of both jazz and blues.

Mambo's intrinsic potential for showcasing brass is exemplified best in Arturo Sandoval's sole contribution, "Mambo Caliente." Sandoval alters this piece from a song into one long, cunningly intricate trumpet solo. His performance reveals both early Latino and jazz influences. One can only wonder why this obviously superior musician only performs one song on this album.

Co-dominating the soundtrack with Tito Puente are the Mambo All-Stars. The All-Stars differ from their peers in that they give more emphasis to percussion than most. Unlike Puente, however, the All-Stars dominated in quantity rather than quality. Although their performance was smooth and tight, none of their five songs was anything more than lackadaisical when compared to Puente's and Sandoval's spirit and drive. Only on "Accidential Mambo" did the All-Stars get off to a good start and soon after reverted to their trademark comatose style. "Mambo All-Stars" is unquestionably a misnomer.

the Mambo KINGS

Newcomer Linda Ronstadt performs surprisingly well in her two pieces. Alternating between Spanish and English lyrics, her soft, throaty voice lend "Quireme Mucho" and the sensual "Perfidia" the necessary emotion to make them memorable. Unfortunately, the second newcomer, Los Lobos did not fare quite so well. Their one song, a remake of "Beautiful Maria Of My Soul," was politely termed "their own dynamic interpretation" in the album's cover notes. Los Lobos manages to take a potentially beautiful, passionate song and render it emotionally devoid of content. The problem is that they try too hard. By overswinging they almost parody the musical style they are using.

Despite its occasional bad points, "The Mambo Kings" soundtrack manages to capture the authentic spirit and passion of the early 1950 mambos. This is unquestionably the album for mambo lovers.

Sweet's pop sound finds home at Cabaret

By COLEEN KENIREY
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Matthew Sweet, who is enjoying success with his most recent release, Girlfriend, will perform at the Chestnut Cabaret April 1. Sweet's 1989 recording with A&M, Earth, garnered him his first critical praise but it is his current work which has made the public take notice. Girlfriend holds the 8th position on Billboards College Album chart this week. Although this marks Sweet's initial brush with fame, it does not constitute his debut effort.

Before Earth, Sweet's first solo work, Inside, was distributed by Columbia Records. Prior to that venture he was involved with an Athens, Ga. band, Oh-Ok, which led to the formation of Buzz of Delight. He obtained other band experience as a bass player for the Golden Palominos.

Girlfriend represents an evolutionary progression in Sweet's sound. His style still has obvious pop influences, but he has now traded mechanical sounding synth-drumbeats for the more natural feel of a human drummer. This change creates a more stripped and unstructured base for Sweet's new songs. Following the recent trend of gathering famous guest stars, Lloyd Cole, Kate Pierson of the B-52's and Greg Leisz of k.d. Lang's band appear on this album.

The lyrics of Sweet's newest songs are semi-autobiographical and they examine deep human emotions. They are the result of the turmoil of Sweet's recent divorce and simultaneous beginning of a new relationship. Thus he addresses such polar opposites as betrayal in "Thought I Knew You" and intimate relationships in "Your Sweet Voice." Other songs deal with the destructive power of truth, the constant factor of change in all things, the death of a loved one and the problems encountered in modern belief in God. Girlfriend offers an emotionally charged selection of deeply reflective lyrics and a strong departure from modern, synthesized simplicity.

FLASH: Buckwheat Zydeco's sound on their new album, On Track, has been described recently by Rolling Stone as "a clanking ensemble-percussion style underpinned by ratcheting rubboard patterns." The band, led by singer Stanley Dural Jr., originates from Lafayette, La. They have retained the lively southern appeal of the zydeco music of this French-speaking Creole region, while adding soulful R & B influences.

Zydeco music traditionally centers its energetic arrangements around the accordian, a tradition maintained by Buckwheat Zydeco with the added elements of Uptown Horns and harmonica with bluesy backup vocals. Dural's son Reginald provides the driving rubboard sounds which tie these components together. "Buckwheat" Dural and his zydeco band will generate their powerful and spirited Southern gumbo of musical styles at the Chestnut Cabaret Mar. 27.

Ska fuses upbeat horns and hardcore rock

By THOM ARNO
Staff Reporter

Ska is everywhere, but you may not know it. It is in your room, in your tape deck whilst you fly down the interstate, and at the dinner table. The evasive mosquito is even on MTV, unbeknownst to the ever-aware vee-jays. You love ska, but you are oblivious. So pick up the clue phone . . . dial one.

Ska gave way to reggae, which fell to the late '70s punk-aggro scene. Now, ska is becoming embraced by such established acts as Fishbone; but its main thrust is coming from a schizoid faction of young, talented bands from all around the country.

Most likely, the first taste of ska you received was in the early-'80s, with the Police, who incorporated a ska-esque, jangly feeling into their many hits. A slew of other English bands infiltrated the States around this era and tucked ska in with their visas. You remember Madness ("Our house, in the middle of our street"); THAT Madness. And you may recall the music of the Specials and Selector; that was ska.

And while the time of the early '80s may be gone, the popularity of ska is not. Recently, a messy outbreak of ska-influenced bands has occurred in the Northeast. From the Mighty Mighty Bosstones to Bim Skala Bim, from Fly Spinach Fly to Chucklehead and back again, ska has hit New England hard. Perhaps the most well-known band from this lot, so far, is the Bosstones. This Boston-based, eight-member crew is signed to the Taang! label and has released two albums, Devil's Night Out and the new More Noise and Other Disturbances, and an EP, Where'd You Go in the last two years. They manage to blend raw hardcore grunge and upbeat horn lines — perhaps the primary staple of ska — into a distinct musical style that has been the catalyst of their success. Basically, word of mouth and college radio airplay have allowed the 'Tones to get out of the Northeast and even get some shows regionally.

Bim Skala Bim, Chucklehead and Fly Spinach Fly, perhaps lesser known, still show promise of breaking through to the suburbs of the mainstream. Bim, also from Boston, has two discs, Tuba City and the recent How's It Goin,' circulating the Northeast. Chucklehead was given a cameo appearance recently on an MTV special and keeps high aspirations for signing with a label. Fly Spinach Fly, another eight-member band, hail from Dover, N.H. They are fresh off an appearance on MTV's "Spring Break" as the Northeast's representative to the "Rockin' Campus Bash." Since Daytona, they have raised the eyebrows of Atlantic and Polygram Records, who are impressed with their independent release, Nature's Candy, and their kinetic live shows.

That may be what all these bands share as followers of ska. It is a simple, funky, horn-tinged guitar music with a loose message and an even looser following. Ska bands and their fans enjoy the intense physical contact of live shows; not necessarily the mindless let's-bash-our-skulls-together-because-we-know-all-the-words-to-Nirvana slam-dance mentality. Whether these bands play to 2,000 people or three-and-a-half million, the energy is always there, between the band and the crowd.

> Ska is a simple, funky, horn-tinged, wah-wah guitar music with a loose message and an even looser following.

And all are inspired by the success of Fishbone, the seven-member, L.A.-based band that has managed, over the last 11 years, to blend ska, funk, jazz and metal into a popular genre all of its own. Since their self-titled, 1985 debut, heavy ska influences have shimmied through. "Party At Ground Zero," off Fishbone, with its infectious hook, has served as their ska-blueprint. And they have followed with "Cholly," " 'Simon Says' the Kingpin" and "A Selection" from 1986's In Your Face; "Ma and Pa," "Question of Life," and "Ghetto Soundwave" from '88's Truth and Soul. With their most recent release, The Reality of My Surroundings, 'Bone has attempted to mash all types of musical styles in each song. The stellar tracks "Housework," "Everyday Sunshine" and "Naz-Tee Man," however, outshine the rest in terms of plainly evident ska influences.

Their live show, spearheaded by the Maverick of Visual Entertainment, singer/saxophonist Angelo Moore, leaves nothing to be desired (except by other bands). Moore spins his baton like a high-stepping majorette, dives into the receptive crowd (the Fishpond) and sweats half of his body off in a matter of two hours. And the rest of the band follows suit. On stage, Fishbone fully represent the energy and passion that is ska music.

So this is ska; a jolly musical expression that transcends all boundaries. If you so desire, hunt down titles by the aforementioned artists. Or, scan the area for other bands — such as the local ska purveyors, Scramm!!, or sundry bands like BOP (Harvey) and Skatalites.

Huber fourth in World Championships

Vicky Huber, a 1990 graduate of Villanova University, recently finished fourth in the 3000-meter race in the World Track and Field Championships. Huber hopes to compete in the 3000-meters for the U.S. Olympic Team this summer.

Villanova senior Sonia O'Sullivan also turned in an outstanding effort in the 3000-meters, placing seventh in the event. O'Sullivan will represent her native country of Ireland in this year's Summer Olympics.

Greis makes transition from basketball

Former Villanova basketball player Tom Greis has retired from professional basketball to become a stockbroker with Hilliard Lyons in Charlotte, N.C. The 7-foot-3 Greis, a 1990 graduate, played one season for Toshiba Computers in Vienna, Austria.

Netters lose squeaker to Colgate; fall to 1-2

By JUSTIN KESTNER
Assistant Sports Editor

The tennis team suffered a disappointing defeat at the hands of Colgate University March 20. The host Wildcats battled both the weather and the Red Raiders but were forced to settle for a 5-4 loss.

"It was a tough match," said Head Coach Robert Langran. "It could have gone either way and unfortunately it went their way."

At No. 1 singles, Mark Pizzi rebounded from a 6-4 loss in the opening set to cruise to a 6-0 victory in the second set. But Pizzi could not keep him momentum as he dropped the third set 4-6 and the match.

Tom Boutrous was dominant at No. 2 singles, registering a straight-set victory (6-1, 6-2). Boutrous remained undefeated on the year, drawing praise from Langran.

"Tom Boutrous has played very, very well at No. 2 singles," Langran said. "His singles play has been outstanding."

After losing the first set, Stephen Forrest recovered to post a 3-6, 7-5, 6-3 win over his opponent at No. 3 singles. Bryan Cavalier turned in an equally impressive win at No. 4 singles, scoring a 1-6, 6-3, 6-4 victory.

Cavalier is the only freshman to start for 'Nova. In addition to holding the No. 4 singles position, Cavalier also plays at No. 3 doubles.

"It is pretty good for a freshman to crack the starting lineup," said Langran.

Andy Sullivan and Dan Daros both suffered straight-set defeats for the Cats. Sullivan lost 4-6, 3-6 at No. 5 singles, while Daros was defeated 6-7, 2-6 at No. 6 singles.

With the match tied 3-3, 'Nova looked to its doubles teams to serve up a pair of wins. Pizzi and Boutrous provided the team with a victory at No. 2 doubles (7-6, 6-4). But Cavalier and Mark Macler were unsuccessful in their attempt at No. 3 doubles, losing 4-6, 3-6.

All eyes then focused on the pivotal No. 1 doubles match. Forrest Daros dropped the first set 4-6 before recovering to capture the frantic second set in a 7-6 tiebreaker. But they fell 4-6 in the third set, leaving 'Nova with a 5-4 loss.

In an extra match, Rob O'Driscoll lost at No. 7 singles 3-6, 5-7.

"Right now we're down because we lost two of the first three matches by one point (each)," said DAros of the team's start. "And really we could have won both of those matches and been 3-0, but we're 1-2. We have a lot of returning experience. I think we have a solid lineup from top to bottom."

Due to the weather, the Seton Hall match scheduled for March 21 has been rescheduled for today at Seton Hall. The New York University match scheduled for March 22 has been cancelled.

The schedule is not very kind to the Cats. "From here on in, we're down to about one day off a week," said Langran.

Despite the rugged schedule, Langran is optimistic that the team can achieve a mark similar to last season's 15-5 record.

The team is confident it can accomplish its goals. "I think we have that winning spirit," said sophomore Mike Flaherty. "We just haven't gotten it going yet."

NCAA Tourney

Randy Ayers has too many weapons for UNC. In the second game in Lexington, KY, those Fabulous Five Freshmen from Michigan confront Byron Houston and the Oklahoma State Cowboys. Did anyone expect the Wolverines to reach the Sweet 16? Are they still "too young?" Maybe they are young, but there is no denying this team is talented and playing with confidence. This should be one of the best basketball games of the season, but look for the upset. Michigan will face Ohio State on Sunday with a trip to Minneapolis on the line.

In the EAST Regional in Philadelphia, Duke is the team to beat. Mike Krzyzewski and the Blue Devils have made it to the Final Four five of the past six years. With Christian Laettner returning, the Blue Devils have one of the best tournament performers in NCAA history. The defending champs have chemistry, defense and tremendous talent.

Kentucky and upstart Massachusetts match up extremely well. Both teams have tremendous three-point shooters, like to play up-tempo, and lack a true big man in the middle. Although UMass is in the midst of a storybook season, Kentucky has been to the Big Dance before. The Cats also have 6-foot-8 Jamal Mashburn, an underrated junior who can either post up or hit the three-pointer. Look for Kentucky to edge the Minutemen, but do not expect Rick Pitino and the Cats to beat Duke.

Heading out to the wild, wild WEST in Albuquerque, N.M., No. 1 seed UCLA faced New Mexico State last night. In this matchup against New Mexico State, the Bruins have an athletic cast of players who play exciting basketball. Don MacLean and Tracy Murray should carry UCLA past the Aggies, but the Bruins will have their work cut out for them in the West Regional final.

When the Bruins face either Florida State or Indiana, look for UCLA to lose. Indiana-Florida State should prove an interesting matchup. Indiana has the ultimate role players. The Hoosiers also have one of the best coaches in the game.

Golf hits the links at William and Mary

By RYAN FANNON
Staff Reporter

After finishing its fall season with the Big East Tournament in October, the Villanova men's golf team began its 1992 Spring Campaign by competing in the William and Mary Invitational over Spring Break. The tournament was held at Kingsmill Country Club in Williamsburg, Va., where the PGA Tour holds the Anheuser-Busch Golf Classic annually.

Guided by first-year Head Coach Tom Shallow, the team finished 13th among a field of 21. Senior Pete Morrice led the Wildcats with a two-round total of 159. Freshman Jon Kelly and sophomore Rob Booth each posted a total of 161 while junior Chris Cox fired a two-round score of 162. Chad Wasserman recorded a score of 164. This was the Cats' first outing since last Fall.

"This year is somewhat of a rebuilding year for us after losing two of our top three players to graduation," said Morrice. "We do have a few players that have contributed for several years, yet overall we are a very young team."

> Pete Morrice

Morrice also believes that the team has much potential but it must become more consistent both on the individual and team levels to succeed. "Our team would often put two solid scores together each day, yet to be a good team at this level we have to put four solid scores together everyday," Morrice said.

Other players that could make a serious impact on this year's team are Jason Cordes, Mike Merriman and Steve Ruoff and Rick Wurster, both walk-ons. Senior Eric Groh will not be able to play this season due to a leg injury.

In the Fall season, the Cats finished a disappointing sixth in the Big East Tournament after winning the title in 1990. A highlight of the season was when Kelly won the Big Five Invitational with a one-day total of 75 and the team finished a respectable second.

'Nova has two tournaments left this Spring, the Rutgers and Princeton Invitationals. With impressive performances in these two competitions, the golf team can qualify for the NCAA Eastern Regionals to be held in Maryland later this Spring.
